HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 19, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I will state for the information of the committee that the provision relating to the increase in the personnel of the Navy was read last evening, and is now subject to amendment.

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "midshipman," page 56, line 22, add:

"That additional appointments shall hereafter be made each year by the President of the following persons: The cadet or student standing first in the graduating class of that year in the nautical training school of each State in which such school is now or hereafter maintained at the public expense. The cadet or student ranking second in said graduating class shall be designated as alternate and shall receive the appointment in case the cadet standing first is unable or unwilling to accept or fulfill it; in a like manner the cadet ranking third shall be an alternate for the cadet ranking second."

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is founded on the bill H. R. 7640, introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL]. There are in the United States three nautical training schools, one at Boston, one at New York, and one at Philadelphia. The primany object of these training schools is to supply officers and men for the merchant marine. I brought this subject up in the committee and I investigated it so far as the Naval Department was concerned, and asked their opinion.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. LESSLER. Yes.

Mr. RIXEY. Are the schools Government or private schools?

Mr. LESSLER. They are public schools, maintained in Boston by Massachusetts, in Philadelphia by Pennsylvania, and in the city of New York under the jurisdiction of the New York City board of education. Each of these States and cities appropriates a large sum of money, and the bill has resolutions of indorsement from all of the various bodies governing these various schools.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LESSLER. Just a minute, please. I was starting to say that I went to the Navy Department. The Department has not objected to the bill. Their criticism, strange to say, is that it will harm the schools, and they base that on an experience with the similar school maintained by the United States at New London, an apprentice school. They found there that the school ran down, but I do not believe that the parallel is a similar one.

In my judgment it will bring a better class of men and boys from the city to the school which is training these young men for the sea, and in my judgment we ought to get, if we can, at least one boy a year from each of these places for the great school at Annapolis. Gentlemen may not know, but the great seacoast States, the New England States, which drew their life and money and wealth and men from the sea, have in late years degenerated so far as that is concerned, and the great West is now supplying us with the men who are manning the Navy. So any movement which will tend to bring one boy a year into the service from the great States in which are situated the cities of Boston and Philadelphia and New York, or from other great States, is directly instrumental in helping to upbuild the Navy and in giving to the boys of those great seaboard towns an idea that there is something better to look forward to than simply being a sailor aboard our declining merchant marine or even an officer in that service. I think if gentlemen will look into this question they will see that it will uplift the schools and help to put one boy from each at least into the Navy. I find in the records of the committee that the board of education of New York, and I believe also the legislature of Massachusetts, has passed a resolution asking that this be done.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know if this amendment operates in any way to limit the appointments already provided for in the bill. I did not hear the amendment read, so that I could well understand it, nor have I had an opportunity to look it over.

Mr. LESSLER. Not at all. This simply gives the President the power and makes it peremptory upon his part to appoint the cadet ranking first to the Naval Academy. If the cadet ranking first shall fail to pass the examination, then the alternate shall be the man to stand second, and in case of his failure then the man who stands third.

Mr. RIXEY. Ought not the gentleman to have in his amendment some limitation in regard to the age of the cadet?

Mr. LESSLER. The limitation that is general in the Academy must apply to that.

Mr. RIXEY. But would it apply to this special act?

Mr. LESSLER. I think so. A general limit is there as to the ages, and the gentleman knows all about that.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to say that on the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LESSLER] that his amendment proposes no interference with the appointments by Congressmen as already contemplated in the provisions of the bill I shall not insist on the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, then I shall renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. As I understand it, this will change existing law. While I have not a copy of the rule before me, as I understand it it merely provides for consideration of an increase, and under the rule providing only for an increase it would not be proper to provide different qualifications for that increase.

Mr. LESSLER. The rule provides that the point of order shall not be taken against the proposition changing existing law. The existing law is that the President shall appoint, upon the recommendation of Congressmen, a cadet at such and such time. We change that existing law now and give the President five more under this amendment. We give each Congressman and each Senator an additional cadet during one term, and we change existing law. This in no way violates, contravenes, or contradicts that. I submit, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LESSLER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Is it not the purpose of your amendment to have these cadets to which you refer as an addition to the number provided for in the item in the bill?

Mr. LESSLER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. They are to be an additional number?

Mr. LESSLER. Yes; the bill gives the President five additional, for instance, to those he has now. I do not believe the gentleman's point of order is well taken.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the increase referred to in the rule—I must say that I have not yet a copy of it—was an increase according to the item in this bill and according to the law that we now have—merely to increase the number in that manner.

Mr. LESSLER. Let me ask this question: If this House should desire to pass an amendment giving to each Congressman the appointment of two naval cadets instead of one, does the gentleman think that such a proposed change would not come within the rule? As I understand the rule, the bill in this respect is open to amendment. We can strike out or we can increase.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. After reading this rule, a copy of which has just been handed me, and seeing that it contains the language "it shall be in order to consider legislation providing for an increase," I must say that I am of opinion that the point of order against the amendment is not good and am ready to submit to the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides explicitly that it shall be in order to consider legislation providing for an increase of midshipmen, etc. It will be necessary, in order to do this, that this bill shall adopt some method by which the increase shall be made. The Chair does not see why the method proposed by the gentleman from New York is not as much in order under the rule as the method proposed by the committee in the bill. It is for the House to decide which method is wiser, but either method would seem to be in order.

Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will not be adopted. I want to say only a word upon it.

The proposition has not had any serious consideration. It is not recommended by the committee, it is not recommended by the Navy Department, and it revolutionizes our historic system of appointments to the Naval Academy and the Academy at West Point. All these appointments are made through the intervention of Representatives and Senators and by the President making such appointments at large. If we thus change the method by which entrance to West Point and Annapolis is brought about, we shall find similar naval schools, now being established here and there over the country, as well as every military school in the country, seeking for the same sort of legislation, authorizing, with equal reason and with as sound foundation, that the leading man in each of those schools shall be appointed to one academy or the other. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we ought not, at least now, in this unadvised manner, to enter upon such a revolutionary policy.

Mr. LESSLER. The gentleman from Ohio will allow me to state to him that the appointments of apprentices to the naval school formerly situated at New London were made without the intervention of Congressmen. That school being given up, of course the appointments were given up.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. The apprentices' school was a branch of the Navy Department, and the Navy permits the appointment of officers—certain warrant officers and others—through other channels than by way of Annapolis. But never yet, so far as I know, has an appointment been made from a private or public school outside of Government direction.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say that if this amendment is to pass I wish to submit a provision to allow each university and each State, especially my own State, the right to be represented in this school.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Of course such institutions would have as large a right to preference as the institutions contemplated by this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I hope gentlemen will not leave out the Danville High School. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I trust this amendment will not pass. So far as I am personally concerned, I have been unable to give the matter as serious consideration as I think it deserves, nor do I think that any member of the committee has had such opportunity. It opens up a large field. While of course this particular amendment applies only to three schools, yet I must say that I have a nautical school in my own district, and gentlemen here have indicated other schools in their States or districts. I think this matter is worthy of more serious consideration than we can give it at this hour. Consequently I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. LESSLER, it was rejected.

Mr. PERKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "lieutenant," in line 6, page 59, insert "and from the volunteer officers who served in the Marine Corps during the war with Spain;" so that the clause will read: "not below the grade of first lieutenant, and from the volunteer officers who served in the Marine Corps during the war with Spain."

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this amendment will not be opposed by the committee; and it has been recommended by the officers of the Department.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] a question. What is the intent of the amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. The intent is this: It will make eligible for appointment two officers who served with distinction during the Spanish war. They will not be jumped over anybody whom they did not precede. They are not eligible under the act as it stands, but under this amendment they may be eligible for appointment to the staff positions contemplated by the bill.

Mr. VANDIVER. Without reference to age?

Mr. PERKINS. There is no limitation of age in reference to staff appointments. These men are too old to go in as second lieutenants; they are men 35 years of age.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that I am not opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. PERKINS demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 28.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to explain this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] may debate the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Let us first have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen of the committee will look on page 59 of the bill now under consideration, at the top of the page, they will see that it provides that appointments to the grade of captain, not in the line, but on the staff, may be filled by those holding the rank of first lieutenant in the Marine Corps. The amendment which is offered will make eligible for appointment to the same position two officers who served with distinction throughout the entire Cuban war, but who, after the Cuban war—one by reason of sickness that was incurred in the war, and one from other reasons—were not able to continue in the service. They are now made eligible for restoration to the same positions that they held. They are passed over no one. The right to appoint them is recommended by the officers in command of the Marine Corps. This right of appointment, if given, must be exercised by the appointing power. This amendment is not opposed by the Naval Committee, and I really can see no reason why, when the officers of the Marine Corps are in favor of it, when the Naval Committee are in favor of it, the amendment should not pass. It simply seeks to make eligible these two men who have done gallant service for their country in actual war—not merely serving in days of peace, but in time of war. I do not know why anyone should oppose the proposition.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is there any certainty that these men will be the beneficiaries under this amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. Like all laws, this leaves it for the appointing power to appoint them. If the appointing power should not desire to appoint them, of course Congress will not force their appointment.

Mr. PAYNE. Are there only two of these men?

Mr. PERKINS. There are but two men who will be eligible under this provision.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman state who they are?

Mr. PERKINS. One is First Lieutenant Nevin. The name of the other gentleman, though I have been told it, I do not now remember.

Mr. LANDIS. Where do they live?

Mr. PERKINS. Lieutenant Nevin is a West Point officer, originally appointed from Rochester, the district I represent. That is why I know him personally. He went through West Point, and during the Cuban war he served in the Marine Corps. At the close of the war, on account of yellow fever that he contracted in the war, he was obliged to retire from the service. He did not leave because he wanted to, but he left because he had to. Now he is again able to assume this command. He has the approval of every commanding officer under whom he served; and I really do not think any member of this House, knowing these facts, should begrudge to men who served faithfully through the war, and whose disability occurred after the war, the right to return just where they were.

Mr. LANDIS. Why did this man retire originally, after he graduated from West Point?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know. He went into the Marine Corps; I could not tell you why.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be better legislation to pass a bill to make these men eligible than it would be to put into a general statute, to run for all time, a measure that seems to take in the whole of the volunteer force that served in that war?

Mr. PERKINS. No; the gentleman, I think, is incorrect in his construction of the bill. The bill makes provision for the appointment of a certain number of officers who may be taken from the first lieutenants of marines. The only two officers who served in the Marine Corps in the Cuban war, who are not in the regular service, and who could be made eligible, are these two men. As the Cuban war can not be fought over again, certainly no new men will appear in the future. There are but two officers on the rolls not now in the service that now or ever in the future could be eligible to this appointment. So the evil apprehended by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] could not occur.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think it would be much better legislation to let them come in on their merits.

Mr. HULL. How old are these men?

Mr. PERKINS. About 35.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the demand of the gentleman from New York for tellers.

The question was taken and tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order that there is so much disorder that we can not hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order, and gentlemen will cease conversation.

Insert at the end of line 22, page 56, after the word "midshipman," the following: "Provided further, That immediately upon the passage of this act each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, who has not had an appointment during the Fifty-Seventh Congress, or in whose State, Territory, or district a vacancy shall exist on or before March 4, 1903, shall be permitted to recommend one midshipman to the said Naval Academy.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not change in any sense the number or character of the appointments to be made in the bill now being considered. The same number will be appointed. It does provide simply as to how they shall be appointed. It provides that immediately on the passage of this bill, districts which are now not represented in the Academy by appointments made within the past two years shall appoint at once one candidate for a midshipman, and all districts which are unrepresented in the Academy on the 4th day of March, or before the 4th day of March, on account of failure or death, shall appoint one at or before that time. The bill provides for practically doubling the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy. We postpone action under this bill for a year from the day of the expiration of this Congress. I was told at the Department yesterday that about 15 would be dropped out on account of failure to pass the semiannual examination just completed, and a number of districts have not appointed during the Fifty-seventh Congress. The Naval Academy is not full up to its present capacity to-day. Therefore the amendment provides that certain districts may appoint the first one of the additional quota upon the passage of this bill, and those districts where vacancies shall exist on or before March 4, not probably to exceed 15, may also appoint at once to fill such vacancies.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, no doubt this would be very interesting if it could be heard. I ask for order.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will please take their seats.

Mr. JOY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to go into the details as to this, unless some one wants information as to how it operates. I have conversed with probably a hundred members of the House, and I have yet to find anyone who has found any objection with the proposition submitted in this amendment.

Mr. BOREING. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield to me.

Mr. JOY. Certainly.

Mr. BOREING. There is a vacancy in my district. The cadet from my district graduates, and I will have to name another. I want to know if it will give me an additional cadet?

Mr. JOY. It will give you one at this time and one after this bill goes into effect. It will not at present affect your district at all.

Mr. FOSS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOY. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. I understand the purpose of this amendment is to give outgoing members of Congress an appointment.

Mr. JOY. Partially; it may have that effect and it may not.

Mr. FEELY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOY. Certainly.

Mr. FEELY. I favor the amendment, but I wish to ask this question in order to clear away some objection that may be in the minds of some members on this side. Do I understand that the nomination of the member of the Fifty-seventh Congress by the members who now have a vacancy in their districts will in any way interfere with the right of their successors in the Fifty-eighth Congress?

Mr. JOY. Not at all. I will say further, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], that in some districts where there has not been an appointment made within the past two years it will advance the appointment from that district one year. Those who graduate in 1904 can appoint one now, and one during the next Congress. It may advance them in the time of the appointment one year.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I did not hear the amendment read. I desire to ask the gentleman whether his amendment contemplates the appointment of an additional midshipman in the case where a member of the Fifty-eighth Congress will have the appointment under existing law? Will he have an additional appointment after the 4th of March?

Mr. JOY. It does not affect that. There will be but two from each district at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to continue for five minutes. I would like to hear what he has to say on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I was about to put another question, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Missouri said that the amendment contemplated the appointment of two midshipmen during the term.

Mr. JOY. The amendment has nothing to do with it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. This amendment contemplates the appointment of an additional midshipman in a case where a member of the Fifty-eighth Congress may, under existing law, appoint one without the provisions of the bill.

Mr. JOY. It does not increase the number in any event.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. So the member of Congress will not have the number increased by the provisions of the amendment?

Mr. JOY. He will not. If there is a vacancy in the term, he will have an appointment during the term.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And none other?

Mr. JOY. And none other.

Mr. RIXEY. As I understand the provision now carried in the bill, if a member of the Fifty-eighth Congress would, under the law as it now exists, have an appointment, then this amendment which we propose to adopt would not give him another one during the Fifty-eighth Congress, but his appointment would follow in the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. JOY. On the contrary, let me answer that as far as you have got. This bill provides for additional appointments and the bill takes effect about a year from its date. A member of the Fifty-eighth Congress, if not in the Fifty-seventh, will have an appointment one year from this date.

Mr. RIXEY. I do not so understand it. The new provision reported by the committee provides that the Secretary of the Navy is to arrange these appointments so that one appointment shall be made during every Congress. Well, if a member of the Fifty-eighth Congress has an appointment under existing law during the Fifty-eighth Congress he would not have the additional appointment until the Fifty-ninth Congress, so that every member will have one appointment to Annapolis during each Congress. What I want to get at is this: Take the case of a member of the Fifty-eighth Congress who has an appointment under existing law; if your amendment is adopted, then that district will, practically, have two appointments during that one Congress, one of which will be prior to March 4, 1903.

Mr. JOY. No, it would not; this advances the appointment, and it is charged to the Fifty-seventh Congress. There is bound to be one for every Congress and one for every one in the Fifth-eighth Congress. This advances it and charges it to the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. RIXEY. Let me suggest this: Every member of the Fifty-eighth Congress will have an appointment to Annapolis. About one-half will be under the existing law because they will fall in during the Fifty-eighth Congress. Now, the other half will not come until the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. JOY. If they appoint a cadet under this bill, they will appoint but one during the Fifty-eighth Congress. This amendment advances one appointment, and it is charged to the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. RIXEY. In many cases it gives the district an appointment two years in advance.

Mr. JOY. One year in advance.

Mr. RIXEY. One whole Congress in advance.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Is not the practical effect of this that the provision of the law appointing a midshipman to each district—that in the case of these two coming in the Fifty-eighth Congress, one of them would be appointed by the retiring member in the Fifty-seventh Congress?

Mr. JOY. Yes; that is the only effect. It advances it so that two can not be appointed during the same Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri, having read his amendment rather hurriedly a minute ago, if this resolution does not mean that every member of the present Congress who has not appointed a midshipman to Annapolis shall have the right before the 4th of March to appoint another?

Mr. JOY. Certainly it does.

Mr. BARTLETT. It says that every member of the Fifty-seventh Congress who has not made an appointment to Annapolis shall have the right to make one. Take my own case. I have a midshipman at Annapolis who was appointed when I was a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress. I am a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and I have been elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress. Now, will the gentleman tell me how that affects a case of this sort?

Mr. JOY. If you have not appointed during the term of the Fifty-seventh Congress——

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not.

Mr. JOY. You will have an appointment chargeable to this Congress and another one in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment read again at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. JOY. I ask that it be read again.

A MEMBER. Let us have order while it is being read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole will be in order. Gentlemen will please cease conversation.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I hope we may have order while I propound an inquiry, which I shall do at the risk of repetition. My case is that of a naval cadet graduated a few weeks ago. I have been informed by the Navy Department that a cadetship will be accredited to me for appointment after the 4th day of March, 1903, which means that, as I am my own successor, I shall, by virtue of that fact, have an appointment in that year. Now, this bill, as I understand, provides for additional midshipmen. Shall I have two appointments under the provision proposed by the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. JOY. I think not, at that time. There is a vacancy for which the gentleman can make an appointment after the 4th of March.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I have now that right, according to a letter from the Navy Department, the substance of which is repeated in another letter sent to make it clear. The gentleman probably misunderstands the inquiry. The case as stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is my case also, as I understand it; that is, I get no appointment in the Fifty-seventh Congress, but shall have one due to me on the 4th of March next, regardless of the provision borne in this bill.

Mr. JOY. As I understand, under the operation of this amendment the gentleman will have an appointment before the 4th of March and another during the Fifty-eighth Congress, when the provision for these additional appointments takes effect.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That covers my case.

Mr. JOY. And that is exactly what will occur.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Shall I, then, secure the appointment of two cadets in the Fifty-eighth Congress under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. JOY. Not for the same class. The gentleman will have one before the 4th of March and another when this bill goes into effect next year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then it is the gentleman's understanding that this provision of the bill will not go into effect for the purpose of securing me an additional appointment until the coming year?

Mr. JOY. That is my understanding.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY] yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. JOY. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The language of the gentleman's amendment covers every Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress. Now, during the Fifty-seventh Congress the "grim messenger" has visited this House many times. We have on this floor several gentlemen who have been elected to fill unexpired terms. Some of them have been here for only three months. Now, will the gentleman's amendment operate to give each of those gentlemen the appointment of a cadet to Annapolis regardless of the peculiar circumstances of their case?

Mr. JOY. No; I think not. My amendment follows the language of the bill, and I do not think it affects the condition of things in such districts at all. In my view there can be but one appointee from such a district under the law, whether there has been a vacancy filled by a new election or not.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Take the case of a district in which one member has died and another is here to fill the unexpired term. The one now occupying the position has had no appointment during the Fifty-seventh Congress. The amendment of the gentleman, as I construe it, will give to such a man personally an appointment from his district. The gentleman in whose place the present member has been elected may have nominated a cadet, and yet under the amendment there may be an appointment coming to the gentleman who has succeeded and who fills the unexpired term. That is my construction of the amendment. It gives arbitrarily to the gentleman who is filling the unexpired term of his predecessor, who was elected for the same term, an appointment as an individual.

Mr. JOY. I do not think the amendment can be so construed, although it does speak of members in a sense personally. There can be but two appointments from the district; that is provided for by law.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Admitting that, I ask the gentleman to consider this case: Suppose that A was elected to this House, nominated a cadet, and afterwards died. B is elected for the unexpired term. Now, the naval bill, if it should pass as it stands, gives two appointments to each district. The gentleman's amendment, as it seems to me, gives arbitrarily this right of appointment to B, who is filling an unexpired term, instead of leaving it, as in the natural order of things, to the gentleman who will succeed him on the 4th of March.

Mr. JOY. That might be the construction but for the language of the general act, which provides that "each Senator, Representative, and Delegate may recommend only one midshipman during each Congress." There can be but one from a district during each Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JOY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman from Missouri understood the question I put to him as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] seems to have understood it, then he did not get my question. What I desire to know of the gentleman is this: A member of the Fifty-sixth Congress appointed a cadet—called a "cadet" at that time and now called a "midshipman"—to Annapolis some time before the adjournment of that Congress. He had at that time been reelected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. JOY. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The cadet appointed went to Annapolis in June, 1901. Now, the Congressman made that appointment, not by reason of being a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress, but by reason of being a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress. What I want to know is this: Would he, as a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress, under the gentleman's amendment, also have the right to appoint a midshipman under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. JOY. The member of the Fifty-seventh Congress would have a right to appoint another midshipman. He would then not be able to appoint another one until there was a vacancy in his district, the law providing that but two be appointed from each district and but one appointed each Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that, but I want to get to where I can understand the gentleman's amendment. I want to support it if I can. Does this mean that every member of the Fifty-seventh Congress shall have the right to appoint one cadet?

Mr. JOY. No; only every member who has not appointed during the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOY. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. In the Fifty-seventh Congress I represent the Fourteenth district of Pennsylvania. In the Fifty-eighth Congress a county which is not now in my district will be made a part of the district I represent. The districting has been changed so that in the Fifty-eighth Congress I shall represent the Eighteenth, which, as I say, contains one county now not in my district. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY], if the gentleman who now represents the district in which is that county and is an outgoing member, should appoint a cadet or midshipman from that county, I now having one in the other county, thus making two midshipmen in my district in the Fifty-eighth Congress, would I then under this bill be entitled to appoint another or would I be deprived of that privilege by the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. JOY. I will say that in that case, as this appointment will be charged to the Fifty-seventh Congress, the appointment will go upon the lines of the district represented up to the 4th of March; that is, the old district which the gentleman represents, as I understand it, in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. OLMSTED. In the Fifty-eighth I should then have two midshipmen in my district. Can I appoint another during the Fifty-eighth Congress?

Mr. JOY. If this one is then in another district, yes. The person who represents the additional county will be deprived of one. That will be the effect of gerrymandering in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. There has been nothing of that kind. They may both be in my district in the Fifty-eighth. Would that deprive me of an appointment in that Congress?

Mr. JOY. I should not think so.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JOY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: Under the gentleman's amendment it is probable that one-half the members of Congress will be entitled to an appointment. Does this also apply to Senators as well as Representatives?

Mr. JOY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Then there would be probably 220 appointees to be made to the class that enters this fall. Would not that of necessity deprive other members, who would be entitled to a cadet this fall, of their appointment, or else have that class with 360 members in it; and would you not have there one class with three times as many students in it as another, and 50 per cent more students than the other two classes? Would not the amendment result in having 360 members in one class, 240 in one, 240 in one, and 120 in the other?

Mr. JOY. Let me answer the gentleman by stating a fact. There are to-day in the fourth class—that is, the class that has been a year in the Naval Academy—about 151 midshipmen. Only that number has passed and go on to the second year.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Is it not evident, if this bill passes as it is now intended, that finally there will be 984 cadets at the Academy?

Mr. JOY. If all pass their examinations, substantially, yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. There is an average class of about 240?

Mr. JOY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Then if we have a class of 240 your amendment will allow 240 members to be appointed by men who have not had appointments in this Congress.

Mr. JOY. Oh, I do not think it will by any means reach that number.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. They will be appointed every four years. So it is natural that one-fourth of the members will appoint each year, or one-half the members of Congress during one Congress. The result of your bill will necessarily be either to have the class 50 per cent larger than it ought to be, or else to deny the right of appointment to one-fourth of those members of Congress who are entitled to appointment this year.

Mr. JOY. The classes are now 33 per cent smaller than they ought to be, or more than that.

The time of Mr. JOY having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOY. Yes.

Mr. VANDIVER. I will ask my colleague from Missouri if it is not the purpose and the only purpose of his amendment to make this new law operative from the Fifty-seventh Congress instead of the Fifty-eighth, supposing the bill to become a law?

Mr. JOY. That is all, as far as appointments are concerned.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the pending amendment by striking out the words "who has not had an appointment during the Fifty-seventh Congress or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to be heard?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment because it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY], if enacted into law, will result in a palpable contradiction or else in an extension in the number of cadets, which the original law does not contemplate. It seems to me the only construction to be put upon the words of the original amendment is that any member or Senator who has not had an appointment to the Academy during the Fifty-seventh Congress shall have that right between now and the 4th of March whether a vacancy exists from his district or not. Now, it seems that there would be some reason why a member in whose district a vacancy has occurred might have the right to make the appointment now, but I can see no reason why a member should have that right when no vacancy exists in his district. That is the reason I offer this amendment.

Mr. LESSLER. For the information of the gentleman, I should like to read from the hearings. This matter has been figured out by Captain Brownson, superintendent of the Academy, and for the gentleman's information I will read to him what is found in the hearings—No. 9, page 10—on the subject of the increase of the Navy. He was asked by the chairman:

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any suggestions as to the best way of providing for them?

That is, the vacancies.

Captain BROWNSON. Yes; I have given the matter some thought, and saw with a great deal of pleasure your recommendation that the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy be increased. That was in the same line as recommended by the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. We will have next June 144 vacancies. These will be due to the class graduating and vacancies which already exist. If the bill passes and you divide it into two parts, we will have then about 400 vacancies altogether.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean if we give to each member of Congress an additional appointment?

Captain BROWNSON. Yes; you will have 491 Senatorial and Congressional appointments.

The CHAIRMAN. New ones?

Captain BROWNSON. No; vacancies. If you divide that in two, it makes 245. Adding that to 144 (there are five Presidential appointments, which really would make that 186), and taking half of 492, making 246, you will have 382 vacancies which will exist next June. Now, the experience of some years has shown that only 70 per cent of those vacancies are filled. That is the experience, and it will not run more than 1 or 2 per cent above or below. Taking off the 70 per cent, it will give 268 midshipmen in the fourth class next year, which is about as large as we can handle.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I understand the purpose of this amendment is to give to retiring members of Congress an appointment who have not made an appointment during the present Congress. Is that right? Now, I submit that if that is the intention, then there ought to be words to that effect in the amendment, and I suggest that the gentleman from Missouri insert the word "retiring" before "Senator."

Mr. MUDD. May I interrupt the chairman of the committee?

Mr. HULL. We will all be retiring.

Mr. FOSS. I mean those who are not coming back.

Mr. MUDD. I want to ask this question. If it be the fact, and it likely will be, that this bill will hardly be signed before very late on the 4th of March, what will be the good of it if it does pass? I apprehend this bill will not be signed until near midnight on the 4th of March, and what time will the gentleman from Missouri have to go to the Department and have his appointment made? So there is no use for his amendment even if it passes, though I have no particular opposition to it.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs a question or two. I want to know whether this law providing for the appointment of these cadets changes existing law, that the cadet must be a bona fide resident of the district for two years?

Mr. FOSS. No; it does not change the existing law. That is to say, we reenact the existing law, and provide that the cadet shall be a resident for two years.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, Mr. Chairman, when I first came to Congress I found my district represented by a gentleman from Washington—this city of Washington—and I think about 40 other districts in Congress were represented by nonresidents from somewhere else. For that reason I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee.

I think, Mr. Chairman, before we vote upon this amendment, or any of them, I should like to hear somebody tell us why we need any additional cadets at the Naval Academy. I have not heard that question discussed, and if somebody will undertake to tell us why we need them, I will be very glad to hear him, and will yield him the balance of my time. We are talking about appointing this cadet from this place, and giving members of the Fifty-seventh Congress an appointment, and members of the Fifty-eighth Congress an appointment, and so on; but the question is, Do we need any of them? Do we need any additional cadets? If anybody has anything to say on that here, I would be glad to hear him upon that point.

Mr. FEELY. I think this is a desirable amendment, and I am not going to take up the time of the committee to argue the need of additional midshipmen. The fact is, there are some districts in the United States which for some reason or other have not had the benefit of a nomination of a midshipman from those districts during the Fifty-seventh Congress. I believe it is accepted as a fact that we need more naval officers, and no more argument is needed on that point. If, as the gentleman who suggested the amendment has stated, no member of the incoming Congress or any district to be represented in the Fifty-eighth Congress is affected by its adoption, this amendment ought to be adopted. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I am rather disposed to favor anything that tends reasonably to promote the efficiency of the Navy. I understand this section with reference to midshipmen is based upon the idea of the demands of the Navy in the future; that the Navy lacks officers, and this paragraph tends to supply that needed want as it will arise in the future. Now, if that be the fact, which certainly must be true, why is it that Senators and Representatives who have appointed a cadet in the Fifty-seventh Congress should not be allowed the same privileges as those who have not. The object and purpose of the law, as I understand it, is to increase the number of cadets. If I have made an appointment of a cadet during the Fifty-seventh Congress, I have simply complied with the requirements of the law. The object of this statute, as I understand it, is to increase the number of cadets in order to meet the necessities of the Navy in the future. Then why should a man who has complied simply with the statute be deprived of appointing another cadet because he has already appointed one in the Fifty-seventh Congress? Why do you want to exclude Congressmen who have appointed one in the Fifty-seventh Congress?

Mr. FOSS. I understand that the main object in offering the amendment is a sort of compliment to the retiring members who have not appointed a cadet in this Congress, allowing them to make an appointment.

Mr. JOY. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that question? Under this law, the naval bill, as I understand, there can be but one cadet appointed for each Congress by any member of Congress. Now, if the gentleman did not appoint during the Fifty-seventh Congress, he can appoint but one during the Fifty-eighth, although he is entitled to two from his district. There may be a vacancy there—his cadet may have died, and he can not appoint after the 5th of March but one cadet, and if there is a vacancy and he appoints him after the 5th of March he is to be charged to the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then, if I understand the gentleman from Missouri correctly, this is the result, although I hate to make personal reference, but I can only illustrate my views in that way: I have not made an appointment of a cadet since I have been in the Fifty-seventh Congress, but I am allowed the right, as I have been informed, to make one on the 5th day of March of this year. Then, under the amendment, I will not have the right to appoint a cadet in the Fifty-seventh Congress, because the 5th of March is in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. JOY. Your boy graduated?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes, the boy appointed by some other member. Now, if I make the appointment on the 5th of March, which I am allowed to do under the notice of the Secretary of the Navy, why should I be excluded from making one in the Fifty-seventh Congress?

Mr. JOY. The bill provides that there shall be only two from each district, and this naval bill provides the additional cadets—i. e., two from each district—shall commence from the time the bill goes into effect.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. There is where I do not see the justice of that proposition. You are proceeding upon the idea that the Navy demands these additional officers.

Mr. JOY. I am.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am in sympathy with that proposition, but I think the distribution ought to be made as equitably and fairly among us all as can be made; and when you say that any man in the Fifty-seventh Congress who has not appointed a midshipman shall appoint one, you ought to carry out that rule.

Mr. JOY. That would make two in the same Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, after talking with several members of the committee, I find that my amendment to the amendment was offered under a misapprehension, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding or complexity in regard to the matter, and that the House may vote on the main proposition. I would ask leave to withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment to the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RIXEY) there were—ayes 90, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, page 56, strike out the words "allowed at the Naval Academy" and insert in lieu thereof "appointed at the Naval Academy until June 30, 1911."

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the purpose of this amendment is to limit this great increase of midshipmen at the Naval Academy until the class that last enters prior to June 30, 1911. My amendment strikes out the words "allowed at the Naval Academy" and inserts "appointed at the Naval Academy until June 30, 1911."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear the amendment read, and I would like to ask the gentleman in which line does he insert his amendment?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. In line 12, page 56. The only purpose will be that until June 30, 1911, these extra appointments shall be made and shall not thereafter be made. Of course we all recognize that we must have more officers for our great Navy. We realize that it is necessary to have a greater number of cadets at the Naval Academy, but there are many of us who do not believe that it is necessary to have this large increase in number of midshipmen made permanent. For instance, if the amendment I have offered is adopted, there will be extra men appointed to the number of 994, or rather 982; and if the three Territories are admitted as States, it would add 12 more, making 994 in all, prior to June 30, 1911, and the class graduating in 1915 will be the last one with this increase.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, would it not be very much more easily done to repeal this statute and reenact it?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I was about to come to that point. We know that it will be much easier to put this limitation upon it now than to repeal the law hereafter. It is easier to limit now than to enact a limitation hereafter. Can you expect a Congress eight or ten years from now, when every member is entitled to the appointment of two midshipmen at the Naval Academy, to repeal it as confidently as you can expect this Congress to put the limitation upon it? This is one of the very points in favor of the amendment. The judgment of every member will tell him that it is not necessary to have this large number in the Naval Academy permanent. The proposition last year was to give an increase of about 500 cadets, running over a period of four or five years. My amendment will give that increase of nearly 1,000 cadets during the period included in my amendment. There will be this increase in appointments to eight classes. These eight classes will increase the number by two cadets during that period from each district and for each Senator and Delegate. They will have the number under the present law and then two additional ones. In other words, they will have a cadet for each term of Congress from now until June 30, 1911.

It seems to me that if you do not now put a limitation on this provision, you will never be able to put it on; and if you never put it on, it will only be a matter of years when our official list will be largely in excess of the demands of the Navy. I am not sure that I can state at this moment how many officers of the line our Navy ought to have. I recollect that the Secretary of the Navy says there is now a deficiency in the number of officers of nearly 600—between 500 and 600. In the regular course of events, without the adoption of this paragraph, there will be an increase of probably 800 officers in the Navy (allowing nearly 200 for failures in examination) within the next eight or ten years. Under this amendment, by the time the last class appointed within the period of limitation graduates there will be probably 1,600 more officers in the Navy than we have to-day, after allowing 800 for failures, deaths, and retirements. There will be 4 classes of 120 each and 8 classes of 240 each, a total of 2,400, without failures or deaths.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Just one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the gentleman's time will be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I believe the Secretary of the Navy said that about 40 officers go on the retired list yearly. Under this large increase, if permanent, if there were no failures or deaths, there would be near 250 men to graduate every year. If there should be 50 retirements and deaths, it would leave an increase of about 200 a year, with failures to be deducted, after these classes begin to graduate for which the increase is provided. And during eight years (because there would be eight graduating classes) with this large increase there would be an increase of approximately 1,600 officers, to say nothing of the increase during the next four years from classes now at the Academy. I believe now is the time to make this limitation; we should not await the uncertainty of the future, because, as I have already said, it will be easier to remove the limitation hereafter, if desirable, than it will be to put on a limitation hereafter, if that should become necessary.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, Secretary Moody in his report says that we have at the present time a deficiency of 577 officers, and that we shall have, when the ships already authorized are completed, a still further deficiency of 498; and if 125 be assumed as the proper allowance for officers in transit, on shore duty, or on leave, we shall have then a deficiency of 1,306. Now, I doubt very much whether, if we put a limitation upon this provision, we shall be able to secure enough officers to meet that deficiency. And when you take into consideration the further fact that we are providing in this bill for new ships, which must be officered in the future, it is easy to see the effect of limiting this provision to eight years, as suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Is it not true that, allowing 17 officers to a ship, there will be required 68 for the ships carried in this bill?

Mr. FOSS. Battle ships.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Yes; battle ships and armored cruisers. Then, if we never build our ships faster than we are now doing—and I think we are going ahead fast enough—it will require about 70 officers a year to officer them. Now, if we add something for retirements and deaths, we shall require say 80 officers a year to man our increased number of ships. Now, if we should graduate 250 or 200 men a year, it seems to me it is a simple matter of mathematics when the time will come when we shall be increasing the number of officers every year by something like 100 more men than we shall need.

Mr. FOSS. In the first place, the gentleman does not know how many we shall graduate; and in the second place, he does not take into consideration the matter of retirement.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I allowed 25 per cent for that.

Mr. RIXEY. I should like to make a single suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS]. When the discussion on this bill was opened by the gentleman the other day, I asked him if he remembered that the Secretary of the Navy had said anything in the hearings as to whether there ought to be a limitation. He did not remember; nor did I at that time. I find, however, in the hearings——

Mr. FOSS. I have the statement here.

Mr. RIXEY (continuing). This statement by Secretary Moody:

By the best computation that we can make we, at the end of ten years, would fill up the deficiency which, under present conditions, would then exist.

Then, a few pages further on, the Secretary states, in reply to a question by the chairman as to whether the provision ought to be temporary or permanent:

I do not think it makes any practical difference; I would as lief make it a number of years as not. Of course it is always within the control of Congress at any time.

Then, again, in reply to another question of the chairman, the Secretary says:

I can put it in seven or ten years.

Now, the limitation proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina is eleven years, and I think the effect of the amendment adopted a few moments ago, offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY] is to give us about 200 additional cadets and give them to us at once, because it does not take away from the man who comes into the Fifty-eighth Congress the right to make an appointment.

Mr. FOSS. Well, I think, Mr. Chairman, we better stand upon the statement of the Secretary of the Navy. When this question was put to him, he said: "Of course it is always within the control of Congress at any time." Now, if we put a limitation here, we may make the time too short, but Congress at any time can limit this provision.

Mr. VANDIVER. Does not the chairman concede that it is a much easier matter to put the limitation in now than to repeal the law afterwards?

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer that question. If this amendment prevails as presented here, in 1911—I believe that is the date the gentleman fixes?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. That is the date for the appointments. Of course the classes would contain this increase until 1915.

Mr. DAYTON. Yes. After 1911 there will be no more appointment of midshipmen at the Naval Academy, if this amendment prevails. All appointments will be cut off. There will be no further law providing for midshipmen.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. The gentleman from West Virginia surely knows that we can amend this paragraph if this amendment is adopted, to return to the old law. The gentleman knows Congress will not leave it in the shape he fears it will be left.

Mr. DAYTON. I simply take the gentleman at what he states in his amendment, and it shows the unwisdom of attempting on the floor of this House to interfere with the judgment of the committee where all these matters have been thoroughly and carefully considered. If his amendment prevails, after 1911, eight years from now, there will be no necessity for a Naval Academy, because there will be no law providing for the appointment of midshipmen to be educated there. Now, under these circumstances, his amendment requires a further amendment. It will require further legislation. It is a good deal easier to leave it until the exigency arises showing that we are having more officers created than needed; it is better to leave it until that time and then make the necessary legislation. I think there will be a Congress in session about that time which will be prompt to take the matter up.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will remember the letter which Mr. Tracy, Secretary of the Navy, sent to Congress ten years ago, in which he stated that there was no use for the number of naval officers, that they had more officers than they had ships on which to place them. And was there any proposition made at that time to decrease the number of cadets at Annapolis?

Mr. DAYTON. The period was extended from four to six years. Two or three classes were honorably discharged, and the mistake and blunder of that course is apparent to-day, when we are in condition where we can not man with officers the ships we actually have.

Mr. MANN. But there was no decrease in the number of cadets by action of Congress at that time.

Mr. DAYTON. It was done indirectly by increasing the years relating to appointment from four to six.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that that simply illustrates the fact that Congress never has and never will decrease the number of appointments which it itself makes?

Mr. DAYTON. I think it illustrates exactly the contrary, because Congress did decrease the number of appointments, indirectly and practically. It provided that a member of Congress should appoint a cadet once in six years instead of once in four years, and it threw out three, if I remember rightly, at least two, classes that were graduated from the Academy.

Mr. MANN. It threw them out after they had been graduated, but still kept encouraging members of Congress to put new ones in. It kept educating officers for which it had no use at all in the Navy.

Mr. DAYTON. It seems to me that any gentleman who can think for a moment will see that an increase in the years from four to six reduced practically the number of cadets one-third.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we are going ahead with legislation for cadets more rapidly than the necessities of the occasion require. There should be some limitation, as provided in the amendment. A few years ago a member of Congress only had one appointment to Annapolis in six years. It was during the last Congress, I believe, that the number of years was reduced to four. This Congress has now reduced it to two years, and the question is, Shall we want these appointments every Congress indefinitely?

The Secretary of the Navy during the last Congress came before the committee and stated that he wanted provision for 500 cadets. He did not get them in the last bill. He came before the committee again in this Congress and said he thought 1,000 additional officers would be sufficient to meet the needs of the Navy for the ships already authorized. He said that we had a number of battle ships and cruisers building, and that he wanted officers, but he felt assured that with the provision for a thousand new officers we would have enough under the law as it now exists.

Now, according to a calculation which I have made, and which I believe to be substantially correct, if the limitation of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN] prevails we will appoint to the Academy by 1911 not less than 2,000 cadets. That will give ample provision for the deficiency in officers. It does seem to me, in view of the fact that it can not be denied that when you once give patronage to the House it is very hard to take it away, the time to put a limitation on the power of appointment is now.

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Chairman, the report of the Secretary, together with the report of the head of the Bureau of Navigation, do not quite bear out the gentleman from Virginia or the gentleman from North Carolina. Briefly, this is a summary of the figures: The number now short is 577; necessary for the new ships now building, taking no account of this programme, 498. Adding 25 per cent for sick leave brings us up to 623. Adding those who die and retire makes 783. These, together with the 577, give us 1,360. From this 1,360 we deduct about 355 who will come from the Academy up to July 1, 1906. This takes no account of the increase granted by the House in this bill.

On July 1, 1906, at the present rate we will be 1,005 officers short. Under the increase, according to the percentage of cadets, we will get about 200 a year four years from this year's class. The Secretary stated that it will take about ten years to supply that deficiency. On this calculation it will take about twelve years of these additional appointments, appointed each year on the basis of figures taken from the report of the admiral who is Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, to catch up with the present Navy, allowing for no increase. Those are the exact figures worked out.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in order that the House may vote upon the exact proposition at issue between us here, I offer an amendment to my amendment. Insert after the word "midshipmen," in line 13, the words:

And thereafter one midshipman as now provided by law.

So that the section will read as follows:

There shall be appointed at the Naval Academy until the 30th day of June, 1911, two midshipmen, and thereafter one midshipman as now provided by law, for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress—

And so forth. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that disposes of one of the criticisms made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] against this provision. It is apparent to anyone, after the inadvertence has been discovered by the gentleman from West Virginia, that it is easy to correct it. It will be obviated by this amendment. It is not the purpose of myself or my colleagues to place a limitation upon this item which will hereafter require legislation for the continued existence of the Naval Academy.

So the only question is whether we shall put this limitation upon it now. I am constrained to believe that unless we do put on this limitation the time will come when the Naval Academy will turn out a great many more officers every year than there is any probability of our Navy requiring. Under this amendment the issue is plainly drawn; and if you desire the limitation, you can support my amendment as I have offered to amend it, knowing that when the limitation expires the Academy at Annapolis will continue to exist practically as under the present law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment to the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, after "midshipmen," insert "and thereafter one midshipman, as now provided by law."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I asked the very distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON], who knows more about any portion of the Navy than I ever expect to learn about all of it, a question as to a letter sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Navy in 1892. At that time there was before Congress a proposition to turn the Revenue-Cutter Service over to the Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy urged that that be done, because there was no occupation for all the officers being turned out of the Academy at Annapolis. The gentleman from West Virginia, forgetting for a moment his great knowledge of naval affairs, replied that Congress at that time did make a reduction of the number at the Academy.

Mr. DAYTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman mentioned 1892?

Mr. MANN. I said ten years ago.

Mr. DAYTON. I did not so understand him.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman misunderstood——

Mr. DAYTON. I did not understand the gentleman, and he shall not misrepresent me in the matter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said that anybody who would think for a moment would know something. The trouble with the gentleman from West Virginia is that he often makes statements without stopping to think for a moment. His whole statement was based upon the question which I asked him in reference to a letter of the Secretary of the Navy ten years ago. But if he did not know the question, his answer, of course, was not appropriate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the Secretary of the Navy in 1892 said that there was no use for all the officers being turned out at Annapolis, and no effort was made by Congress to reduce the number. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly preposterous, when this Congress has just effected a gift to members of the Fifty-seventh Congress who were interested, to expect that some future Congress will take away from themselves that same thing or that any Congress will ever reduce the number of cadets after the members have become entitled to the places. There is trouble now trying to fix the date nearly eight years in advance. We have difficulty in limiting the number of cadets to be appointed eight years from now, because many members, like the gentleman from West Virginia (and I hope he will be then in Congress), will then want appointments to Annapolis.

If there is any intention to put a limit to the number of cadets, the time to limit the number is now. If they need more cadets then, they can be provided for then. When there were no places to give to the officers turned out at Annapolis, there was no effort to limit the number to be appointed. When they were seeking opportunities in civil positions, in the Hydrographic Office and elsewhere, to make use of the naval officers, there was no proposition to decrease the number. No proposition will ever be made to decrease the number of the midshipmen or cadets when the midshipmen or cadets can be appointed by the members who will vote upon the proposition to decrease. It is a very easy matter now to ascertain the number needed; and if the cadets will not be needed beyond 1912, I think the committee may well put it in the bill at this time; and if at that time they need more cadets, the Congress of that day will probably remember the ease with which a special rule can be brought into the House, in violation of the ordinary rules of the House, and thereby add to the number of cadets. If we can not vote against it now, eight years in advance, there will be no hope of anybody being able to vote against it at that time.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want simply to say that my friend from Illinois and I have had a misunderstanding in regard to the period of time he refers to. I recall his attention to the fact that heretofore there was sent to Congress the suggestion that a larger number of cadets were being graduated than the service required; and in accordance with that suggestion the term of the Academy was increased from four to six years; and I presumed that he was referring to that. Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to this fixing the limit of time, it seems to me that it is just as easy for a future Congress to repeal as it will be to limit it now. In truth and in fact, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be an advantage for the service if we would educate naval officers, and military officers too, for that matter, and allow them to be honorably discharged and sent out into the country. During the Spanish war, and I am glad to bear this testimony, it was a good thing that there were naval officers who had graduated from the Academy and yet who had the pride of their education in their hearts; it was a good thing to have them throughout the country both as West Point graduates and as Annapolis graduates, for in every instance they were great powers to strengthen and increase the service when it needed to be increased quickly.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to make one or two brief observations. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] a moment ago remarked that this amendment furnished an illustration of the unwisdom of attempting legislation here on the floor of the House and interfering with the committee's bill. I hope the gentleman does not mean to intimate that this provision comes from the committee with absolute unanimity. I hope he does not mean to intimate, either, that the members of this House are incompetent to pass upon simple propositions like this. I want to remind him that not even the Secretary of the Navy, who originally urged upon us the need of more cadets, objected to putting into the provision this limitation as to the time that it should run.

I want to remind him furthermore of a very well-established fact of legislation, that it is an easy matter to create an office, or provide for an appointment, but the Almighty himself hardly has power in this House to repeal one. [Laughter.] I have never heard of its being done since I have been a member of Congress. I think it is the part of wisdom and prudence, of foresight and statesmanship, to look a little ahead of us and see the difficulty under which those members who may sit here eight or ten years from now may be laboring, and to provide, as far as may be, for lightening their burden of responsibility.

As has been well said by the gentleman from Illinois, if we can not to-day put some check upon the process of multiplying public offices, how can we expect that those people, who are to come afterwards, and have these offices already at their disposal, will have strength and courage enough to resist the temptation to hold onto them. I think it would be wise and prudent if we put a limitation to this, and, in doing so, we will not be antagonizing the suggestions of the Secretary of the Navy himself. We will get 2,500 when only 1,000 extras are needed. I think there ought to be some limitation. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the Chair have the amendment to the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment to the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that both amendments be voted upon together, as it is really one amendment as read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that his amendment be considered as amended. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

The question now arises on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN) there were—ayes 46, noes 51.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN and Mr. FOSS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 63, noes 79.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert, in line 25, page 54, after the word "act," the following: "Ten additional chaplains; in all, 34."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are now 24 naval chaplains. This has been the number in the Navy for over thirty years. In that time the enlisted force of the Navy has been increased four or five times over. In a letter dated the 4th day of January, 1902, Mr. William G. Cassard, a chaplain of the United States Navy, addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Navy, from which I read:

U. S. S. CONSTELLATION,
Naval Training Station, Newport, R. I., January 4, 1902.

SIR: In accordance with permission granted me by the Department in its letter dated December 23, 1901, I have the honor to submit for your consideration and action the following regarding the chaplain corps of the Navy:

2. I would respectfully suggest the desirability of increasing the number in the corps of chaplains from the present limit of 24 to at least 34.

3. The existing number was determined when the Navy was much smaller than it is at present and when the need for a large number of chaplains was not so pressing. At that time the number of chaplains was much larger, relatively, than would be the case at present if the increase should be allowed.

4. At present there are many of our larger class of ships and a number of important shore stations without chaplains, and with the enlargement of the Navy this must be increasingly true unless the corps is adequately enlarged.

5. At this time legislation is pending looking to the enlargement of other corps, and doubtless the increase of the corps of chaplains could be accomplished more easily now than at any future time.

In answer to that communication the then Secretary of the Navy, Hon. John D. Long, under the date of January 19, 1902, wrote as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 19, 1902.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of yours of the 4th instant, submitting suggestions with regard to the number and pay of naval chaplains.

The Department agrees with you that the number, now 24, should be increased, in view of the general increase of the Navy, and it recommended an increase to the last Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the commissioned officers, the enlisted men, and the noncommissioned officers of the Navy proper and the enlisted men, noncommissioned officers, and commissioned officers in the Marine Corps aggregate some 41,000 men, all under the control of the Navy Department. For these men there are now 24 chaplains. The time was in the history of our Navy when every ship having a complement of over 200 men was provided with a chaplain. It appears from the report of the Secretary of the Navy that there are now constructed, or under construction, 10 vessels with a complement of 17 officers, 8 with 15 officers, 9 with 12 officers; in all, 27 vessels, each of which have a complement of more than 300 and perhaps 400 men. There should be in the service a sufficient number of chaplains to assign one to each of these vessels.

In addition to that, there are a large number of naval stations, navy-yards, and other places where enlisted men of the Navy are stationed to which it has been customary to assign chaplains. Wherever there is a receiving station, a naval prison, or any place of that character, chaplains have been assigned. For a number of years Congress has been providing for an increase in the enlisted force of the Navy, but no provision whatever has been made for an increase in the number of chaplains. In this bill 286 additional naval officers are provided, but no additional chaplains. Perhaps it is not well known how valuable a chaplain can be on board of a vessel in the Navy of the United States, if he is a man of the proper character.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unamious consent that I may continue for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On all these vessels the line is clearly and distinctly and severely drawn between the enlisted men and the officers. The men on these ships are away from home influence. They have no friends in whom they can confide when in trouble or distress. The only person in the whole naval service who is in a position to give these men kindly advice, to admonish them, to help them when in trouble, is the naval chaplain. He is the great and kind friend and confidant to whom the enlisted men turn when worry, trouble, or distress possess them. A word from him may put sunshine into the heart of the unhappiest.

It is a notorious fact that the discipline on board the great vessels of the Navy is much better, the control of the men is much easier, when there is assigned to duty on board such vessel a chaplain who by his kindness, by his wisdom, by his love and devotion to the wants of the enlisted men keeps them within proper bounds.

Here is the one opportunity that members of this House will have to vote an increase in this corps. All other branches of the service have been increased but this. Ordinarily such an amendment would not be in order on a bill of this kind, because it provides an increase in the corps of chaplains, and would be a change in existing law and subject to a point of order.

Since some date in the sixties—I have not the exact year—this corps has remained at its present number—24. Mr. Long, the former Secretary of the Navy, in reply to Mr. Cassard, said it was realized that an increase should be made. If the men in the service of the country in the Navy are to receive the consideration to which they are entitled, if the men with conscientious scruples against serving in places where there is no opportunity ever to consult a minister of religion are to have their wants properly attended to and looked after, and if the service is to be made what it should be, this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the chaplains of the Navy have pending before the Committee on Naval Affairs a provision which, in my judgment, should have consideration, first by that committee and afterwards by the House. For the information of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I will say that an attempt was made to provide for the betterment of the chaplains of the Navy. By reason, however, of the pressure of public business, it was found impossible at this session to report a bill which would be entirely acceptable to the chaplains and the Department.

I agree with the gentleman that there is occasion for legislation in behalf of this department of the service; but I suggest to him the propriety of allowing the amendment to lie over until a future time—perhaps the next session of Congress, when I hope to see reported here for the consideration of the House a bill which will not only increase the number of chaplains in the Navy, but will give them increased chances for promotion, which they desire.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say to the gentleman that on the 4th of February, 1902, I introduced a bill, which was referred to the committee of which he is a member, increasing the number of chaplains from 24 to 40. That bill has never received consideration. The committee passed by that proposition at the last session and has passed it by at this session. Now, when will it be possible for that bill or any similar bill to receive consideration at the hands of the Naval Committee?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Three chaplains of the Navy came to the committee room within the last four weeks and asked to be heard. The committee sat and listened to the request they had to make and assured them that it would be impossible to concede to them at this session of Congress, by reason of the shortness of the time, the request which they had to make.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has the Naval Committee at this session reported favorably to this House any general legislation except what is contained in this appropriation bill?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. As affecting the personnel?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Or any other proposition?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I think not. I will say to the gentleman that some private bills, of course, have been reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean legislation of a public character.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I will say further to the gentleman that I pressed with all my might upon the committee a provision for the enlisted men of the Navy. It was, however, deemed advisable that in this bill there should not be incorporated legislation of that character. I want to assure the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that my sympathy is with his proposition—not simply to increase the number of chaplains, but to so legislate for them that they may have a chance for promotion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If we could have the active support of the gentleman now, as well as his sympathy, it would be much more satisfactory and effective.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the three chaplains who appeared before us did not ask, according to my recollection, for an increase.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that when the chaplains appeared, to which the gentleman refers, that the chaplains were asking for some legislation regarding pay, which has nothing whatever to do with the question of an increase in the corps?

Mr. WATSON. But, has the gentleman heard from any source——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, I just read from the letter of the then Secretary of the Navy, dated January, 1902, in which he states that at the last Congress he recommended an increase in this corps.

Mr. WATSON. Has anybody asked on the part of the chaplains an increase in the number of chaplains?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Secretary of the Navy did recommend it in his annual report.

Mr. WATSON. No, no——

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I have just read from his letter, and I will ask the Clerk to give it to me and I will read it again. It is a letter signed by the Secretary of the Navy, and it is as follows——

Mr. WATSON. Oh, I understand what is in that letter. There is no need for the gentleman to recite the alphabet here. We all know it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, is that my time that was just extended?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Before I yield any of it, I would like to correct a statement I made. The chaplains did ask for an increase, but they impressed upon us with greater earnestness a request for increase of salary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were probably looking out for their own interests. I am looking out for the interests of the enlisted men who require the services of these chaplains, and I wish to read this letter for the benefit of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. But I have been all over it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman says that no recommendation was made.

Mr. WATSON. But there were some things which happened of which my friend is not cognizant and has no knowledge. After this letter appeared the Secretary of the Navy came in person before our committee and asked us to defer any further action in regard to the chaplains.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am familiar with that fact, and it grew out of the fact that some of the chaplains were dissatisfied with the pay they were receiving.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; that is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I have no sympathy with those who are dissatisfied; but I do believe that the number of men anxious and willing to serve at the pay now given should be increased for the benefit of the men who need their services.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I did not ask for this time which has been granted to me, and am very much obliged to the gentleman who secured it for me. I would like to surrender it to the donor. Who was it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Why, I will yield it to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no, no!

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes, yes!

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask my friend some questions. The gentleman is a member of the committee. I would ask if he thinks the Navy needs more chaplains?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That is a very hard question to answer. I never was in the service, and I do not know whether they do or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do they need those chaplains?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I can not answer the question because I do not know. I, however, think that as the men in the Navy increase the chaplains should increase.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have you not increased the Navy?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. We have.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are you not increasing it now?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It is proposed by the bill to increase it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then do not you want some more chaplains?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. But the chaplains are asking for additional legislation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I say that I think they need a few more chaplains in the Navy. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Now, in answer to the gentleman, I will say that I do not know that the Navy needs more chaplains. I do say this, that the Secretary of the Navy, as I understood, advised us not to increase the number at this session of Congress. I would assume, however, that if the men increase, the chaplains should be increased, and if, at the right time, the proposition is submitted to me I will vote for an increase in the number of chaplains.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad you are converted now.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make just one statement about this. There need be no difficulty. The Secretary of the Navy originally suggested that there should be some additional chaplains. When he came before the committee he said that he had not had time to investigate the question thoroughly; that there were some questions of rank and pay involved—some questions of increase of salary involved, and that inasmuch as he had not had time to look into it and examine it thoroughly, he suggested that we postpone action until the next session of Congress.

Now I will answer my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] and say that there is probably at this time a need of some more chaplains in the Navy. But, Mr. Chairman, whenever the Navy is increased it should be done systematically and upon a rational basis. We have been increasing a little along this line and a little along that line, adding a little to this staff and a little to that staff, until it is the aim, object, and desire of the Committee on Naval Affairs at the next session of Congress to take up the entire question of the personnel of the Navy and increase it systematically and in accordance with the provisions of law, so that we will not have to be legislating upon an appropriation bill, but put it all on a rational basis. I trust that the gentleman will not press this, because at the next session of Congress these things are sure to be done; there will be no suffering in the meantime, and what he wants done will be done systematically and rationally.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania has, I think, unintentionally put the chaplains in somewhat of a false position when he said that while it was true they had asked for an increase of the number, they had asked with much more earnestness for an increase of salary. Now, as I understood their request, they were very earnest in their petition for a larger number, for an increase of their corps, and their petition for an increase of salary was based only on the incidental advantage of thereby making a rearrangement of their rank.

As it is now, the chaplains, differently from all the other officers of the Navy, go in at a certain salary and remain at that salary. Now, I think what they complained of was not so much the total amount of the money appropriated for that corps as the distribution of it, and I think myself that their complaint was well founded. I do not know that this is going to be entirely satisfactory, even if this amendment is adopted. I am sure, in fact, that it will not be entirely so. But it will cover their request in one particular at least. Now, ordinarily I am opposed to increasing any kind of offices, or the number of appointees; but in a case like this I am disposed to concede the necessity for some more praying in the Navy, and I would still further favor it if it was to be for a little more praying on the other side of the House. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, just one minute. I should like to assure the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] that I had no intention whatever of putting the chaplains in a position which they did not take before the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I should like to finish this statement. I find that in the hearing that was had before the committee by a reference to the headings we can see the different questions discussed. I find "Chaplain Clark's statement," covering perhaps eight or ten lines; "Number of chaplains, 24," covering five lines; "Rank and number," four or five lines. Then I find other headings; "Chaplain's position;" "Chaplains get $2,800;" "Allowance, $109;" "Young and old chaplains have same duties;" "Question of chaplains as seagoing officers;" "Question of military title;" "Clergymen could not command;" "Other side of question of increasing pay of chaplains;" "Mr. BULL'S bill;" "Mr. DAYTON'S bill;" "Objection to chaplains' pay;" "Want increase of corps;" "Objections to start as ensigns;" "Allowances, discrimination;" and so on. I did not mean to put the chaplains in a bad position or in a wrong position.

Mr. VANDIVER. I am quite sure of that and I so stated.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. And I refer the gentleman to the hearings. I sat and listened to the three chaplains for two hours, and I have quite a clear recollection of what they said.

Mr. VANDIVER. If the gentleman wishes to stand by his other statement, I have no objection.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to standing by it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy shall as soon as practicable after the 5th day of March in each year notify in writing each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress of any vacancy which may be regarded as existing in the State, District, or Territory which he represents, and the nomination of a candidate to fill such vacancy shall be made upon the recommendation of the Senator, Representative, or Delegate. Such recommendation shall be made by the 1st day of May of that year, and if not so made the Secretary of the Navy shall fill the vacancy by the appointment of an actual resident of the State, District, or Territory in which the vacancy exists, who shall have been for at least two years immediately preceding his appointment an actual bona fide resident of the State, District, or Territory in which the vacancy exists and shall have the qualifications otherwise prescribed by law.

Mr. DICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 57, line 12, after the word "law," the following: "And provided further, That the Superintendent of the Naval Academy shall make such rules, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, as will effectually prevent the practice of hazing; and any cadet found guilty of participating in or encouraging or countenancing such practice shall be summarily expelled from the Academy and shall not thereafter be appointed to the corps of cadets or be eligible for appointment as a commissioned officer in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps until two years after the graduation of the class of which he was a member."

Mr. DICK. Mr. Chairman, the language of the amendment is identical with the language of the law which we applied to West Point for the suppression of hazing two years ago and which has proved very efficacious, there being but one instance of an offense that has been discovered at West Point since its enactment. It perhaps ought to have applied to both institutions when enacted two years ago. It is quite apparent that it ought to apply to both institutions now, and I trust that it may be adopted in this bill.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that I approve most heartily of this provision. I think it is good, healthy legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of civil force: In the office of the Major-General Commandant: One chief clerk, at $1,600; 1 clerk, at $1,200; 1 messenger, at $840.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, line 14, strike out "eight hundred and forty" and insert "$971.28."

Mr. FOSS. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this provision relates to Mr. John W. Armstrong, a messenger in the Commandant's office. He is an excellent man in every way. This messenger in the office of the Commandant of the Marine Corps was appointed on December 5, 1895, at a salary of $971.28 a year. This salary for this position has been the same since 1870. He is the messenger at the Marine Corps headquarters, and his duties are different from other messengers in the Departments; that is, when some of the clerks of the Commandant's office are off on leave, or sick, he performs their duties. In addition to that, he is responsible for all mail matter sent or received at the headquarters. He receipts for all registered mail, and he collects and sends money orders and mails checks from the Department. There are over $3,000,000 sent out in this manner each fiscal year. He works every Sunday and on all the holidays in the year. The estimates sent by the Navy Department included this salary at $971.28, as usual.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the point of order does not lie against this amendment, because it is the existing law; but for some reason or other the Committee on Naval Affairs in making up the bill cut the salary of this messenger down $131 a year. I know this messenger is one of the most faithful in the Department and one of the most efficient men to-day in the public service, and instead of getting $971 a year he ought to get about $1,500; but I do not ask for an increase of his pay. I simply ask this House not to reduce his pay. I called to see the Secretary of the Navy about this matter, and he told me that he had not recommended the reduction of the pay of this messenger. I trust that this amendment will be adopted and that this messenger will receive the same salary he has been receiving ever since he has been in the public service. He is an honest, faithful, and capable man, and his pay should not be reduced. It is a matter of justice, and I appeal to the members to do the fair thing in the matter. That is all I want to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether this is already the existing law.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in reference to this matter that the Secretary of the Navy, since he has been in charge of the administration of the Navy Department, has been trying to equalize the pay of clerks and messengers all along the line, and it appears in the hearing before the committee that question was taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. The messenger is cut down from $971.28 to $840?
Colonel GOODLOE. That was done by the Secretary.

The question was asked:

Why?
Colonel GOODLOE. I presume so as to put him on the same footing as messengers of the Navy Department.
The CHAIRMAN. Has there been an equalization all the way through the clerks?
Colonel GOODLOE. In this office.
The CHAIRMAN. Only in the Marine Corps?
Colonel REID. Yes, sir.

Now, the purpose of the Secretary of the Navy has been to equalize the pay of the clerks in the Marine Corps with those in the Navy Department proper. I think it is legislation along the right pathway. I have nothing to say as to this particular individual, because I do not know him, but I believe we ought to sustain the Secretary of the Navy in his endeavor to work out some of these problems which are constantly confronting him.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FOSS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER) there were 31 ayes and 48 noes.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. [After counting.] Sixteen gentlemen rising, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fuel, Marine Corps: For heating barracks and quarters, for ranges and stoves for cooking, fuel for enlisted men, for sales to officers, maintaining electric lights, and for hot-air closets, $45,000.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

"That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the Pain's Fireworks Company the sum of $25,000 as and for damages in full settlement of the claims of said Pain's Fireworks Company against the United States, caused by the sale of blank cartridges by the United States to said company and which caused injury and damage by reason of the fact that some of said cartridges were loaded, and the said sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be drawn on the warrant of the Secretary of the Navy, to settle in full said claims as aforesaid."

Mr. FOSS. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withhold his point of order until I can explain this matter to the committee.

Mr. FOSS. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment speaks for itself, but I desire to address the House briefly in regard to it. On the 5th of June, 1899, Pain's Fireworks Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, purchased at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, on a sale of condemned stores belonging to the Navy, sold by sealed proposals, certain goods, among which were "Lot No. 323, consisting of 36,709 cartridges, rifle blank, caliber .45." These cartridges were delivered to the company in the original Government packages, containing about 1,000 cartridges to the box, with the Government label and stamp affixed to each box, stating that they were blank cartridges. Prior to the sale the company sent one of its men to Dover, N. J., at which place these cartridges were stored, and he was furnished with samples of the cartridges, and which were blank cartridges.

The boxes containing the cartridges were trucked to the factory of Pain's Fireworks Company, at Greenfield, Brooklyn, N. Y., and there stored in the original boxes intact. In September, 1899, the company was engaged in giving a series of spectacular pyrotechnical performances at Columbus, Ohio, necessitating the use of these blank cartridges in a theatrical representation of the battle of San Juan. A very serious accident occurred, causing the death of two people and serious injury to several others, by reason of the fact that mixed in with the cartridges sold to the company by the Government as blank cartridges were certain ball cartridges, known as "gallery" cartridges. The bullets causing the injury were recovered and found to be those used in "gallery" cartridges, and on opening additional boxes a number of loaded cartridges were found distributed among the blanks.

These "gallery" cartridges are in appearance similar to blank cartridges, and as they were sold to the company as blank cartridges and labeled as blank cartridges it was impossible to discover the presence of the bullets. The Pain's Company traced the "gallery cartridges" and found that they were made at the Government arsenal at Frankford, Pa. How they came to be mixed in with the blank cartridges, packed in boxes labeled for blank cartridges, is not known. As it was, a dreadful accident occurred, accompanied by loss of life, and its effect was ruinous to the corporation named. Immediately after the accident about $4,000 of the company's money in Columbus, Ohio, was attached in suits for damages, large claims were presented against the corporation, its season at Columbus came to an end, and a series of performances contracted for at Cincinnati in the following week also resulted in loss on account of the fatality.

Such an accident was unheard of in the experience of the company or its officers, and its effect was such that the business of the company was practically terminated. Litigations were commenced by those injured and it resulted finally in the company being thrown into bankruptcy in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of New York. A trustee in bankruptcy was appointed and he is administering at the present time the affairs of the corporation. It is believed that this terrible accident was caused by the negligence of some of the employees of the Navy Department, and that in the interests of justice the Government should make good the loss which came to the company and ruined it. Without considering the irreparable injury which the company has suffered through its enforced bankruptcy, it can trace a direct loss of at least $25,000 to this occurrence, for which sum it has made and filed a claim.

In November, 1899, the former president of Pain's Fireworks Company communicated with Admiral Philip, then commandant at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, giving him all the facts.

This correspondence was referred to the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department, Washington, D. C. Thereafter the claimant received a letter from Admiral Charles O'Neil, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, dated November 29, 1899, in which it was stated that the Bureau had some proof that no such ammunition as that which did the damage had ever been in the possession of the Navy, and stating that the Union Metallic Cartridge Company had informed the Bureau that such ammunition had been made in some instances for State troops. It was also suggested that the State troops at Columbus, Ohio, who took part in the theatrical performance, may have had a few of these gallery cartridges in their boxes, some of which might have caused the damage, and urging that the matter be further investigated. The company was also requested to keep unbroken packages purchased from the Government intact, as an officer from the Bureau would be detailed to overhaul them. But, sir, there can be no mistake about the fact that these ball cartridges came from the boxes purchased from the Government. Immediately after the accident the company opened other boxes, which were in exactly the same condition in which they came from Dover, N. J., and found these ball cartridges mixed in with the blanks. There was no opportunity for the introduction of ball cartridges through error or in any other way. The negligence occurred in the original packing of the boxes, which were labeled "Blank" when they came from the Navy Department.

The corporation of Pain's Fireworks Company has filed all the papers with the Secretary of the Navy. The Navy Department has made a very careful investigation in the matter through its officials and admits that the Government is liable in damages to this company. The claim originally put in by the company is only for $25,000—a very small claim, all things considered. It ought to have been at least $50,000; but this claim was filed promptly at that figure, and the company is now willing to accept that sum in full settlement. It is a just claim and should be paid. The circumstances are deplorable, and the facts can not be successfully controverted. In January of this year I introduced a bill similar to this amendment, at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, and that bill is now pending before the Committee on Naval Affairs. All the papers in the case are now before that committee. In this connection I will read the following affidavit, viz:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of Cook, ss:

Edward Maher, being first duly sworn, on his oath deposes and says that he is a member of the Chicago bar and has been engaged in the practice of his profession as a lawyer in Chicago for many years; that shortly after the 7th day of September, 1899, he was retained and employed by the Pain's Fireworks Company for the purpose of arranging the defense of the said company against certain suits then threatened, growing out of the death and injury of several persons at Columbus, Ohio, on the 7th day of September, 1899.

This affiant further says that he investigated the cases upon his arrival at Columbus and found that a regiment of Ohio State infantry had been engaged with the Pain's Fireworks Company in giving a certain open-air entertainment depicting scenes from the recent Spanish war at the battle of San Juan Hill; that certain cartridges supposed to be blank had been issued by the Pain's attachés to the regiment, and that during the mimic representation of battle the regiment had fired in the direction of the audience, wounding Max Gugenheim, a young man, Smithson, another young man, and one killed, a child named Charles Krag.

This affiant visited the coroner's office at Columbus, Ohio, in September, 1899, and examined the bullet which was exhibited to him by the coroner of the county in which the city of Columbus is situated, and which said bullet was then a part of the records in the case of the inquest on the death of the boy, Charles Krag. The bullet was evidently a target-practice bullet, being somewhat larger than a pea and was round, except where it had become flattened by contact with the skull of the child.

This affiant learned that the regiment was armed with Springfield rifles, caliber .45, and had used same at sham battle. This affiant says he is familiar with the said weapon, having carried one for three years while serving as a private and noncommissioned officer in the Illinois State Infantry, and also was familiar with said weapon through having served as captain commanding a company of infantry of the Illinois State Guards for the further period of three years.

This affiant, from his knowledge so gained, believes that said bullet was an ordinary target-practice bullet, such as he had seen used in target practice with Springfield rifles, caliber .45, and it was not the ordinary service missile used in said rifle.

This affiant further says that he was present on the trial in the circuit court of Cook County, in Chicago, Ill., in the case of Max Gugenheim against Pain's Fireworks Company, for damages, occasioned by being shot on the above date at Columbus, Ohio, and on the same occasion that young Krag was killed. Gugenheim testified that he stood in front of the grand stand, from 150 to 200 feet from where the regiment was firing in the mimic battle aforesaid. Other witnesses testified that the exhibition was going on from 15 to 20 feet from where Gugenheim was standing, there being about 10,000 people on the ground. Mr. Gugenheim testified that he was struck below the right shoulder; that the bullet passed through his body and lodged close to the skin; that he was laid up for a long time after that in consequence of the accident.

Dr. C. M. Taylor, the surgeon called immediately after the shooting, testified that he reached Gugenheim ten or fifteen minutes after the injury; that he examined the patient's pulse, which showed evidence of considerable shock to the system; stimulants were administered, and removed clothing; found an injury on the right side of the chest and at the upper part of the front corresponding to about the fourth or fifth rib; found a wound from which the blood had been freely oozing, and which wound was ragged in appearance. He determined the ball had passed through the body to the extent of about 10 inches, coming near to the surface posteriorly on a line nearly level with the point of entrance in front. He extracted the ball in the presence of a number of doctors. The weight of the ball is about 2¼ drams. He remained in the hospital ten days, and was under the doctor's care for three or four weeks daily thereafter at the home of the patient.

The doctor considered a wound of this character in the location described as of a serious nature, implicating, as it undoubtedly did, important blood vessels and nervous structures. The patient would not, in his opinion, ever entirely recover from the effect of the injury, being such effects as he had just described, together with a predisposition to atmospheric influences and climatic changes, subjecting him to rheumatic conditions and nervous debility.

This affiant has repeatedly seen Springfield rifles discharged while carrying the ordinary service bullet and has noted the effect upon substances struck by the missile, and from such observation he is strongly of the opinion that the ordinary bullet would have completely pierced the body of Gugenheim and would have caused his death. This affiant has no hesitancy in saying from information derived from hearing testimony of witnesses, and the examination of the bullet taken from young Krag's skull, that the bullets were apparently target-practice cartridges, such as he has seen used in Springfield rifles.

Further affiant saith not.

EDWARD MAHER.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 27th day of January, 1903.

[SEAL.] IDA G. ROCK, Notary Public.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Government should pay this money; the company is anxious to get it as soon as possible, in order to wind up its affairs in the bankruptcy court and get out of bankruptcy. If this money is promptly paid it will be able to pay its creditors—the principal creditors being those who have become such by reason of this accident—about 35 cents on the dollar, as I am informed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. I ask a few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the trustee in bankruptcy of this corporation called to see the Secretary of the Navy, and was told that there were no funds available to liquidate this claim, and it was suggested that a bill be introduced here to do it. This was done, but the committee has been so busy it has been unable to consider it thus far. In order to expedite the payment of this just claim I offer the amendment to the naval appropriation bill, because I realize it is very important to this company, a very well-known company in this country, to get the money justly due it, in order to settle its affairs and get out of bankruptcy. I believe the Secretary does not object.

Mr. FOSS. Has the gentleman a letter to that effect?

Mr. SULZER. No; I have not a letter to that effect, but I spoke to the Secretary about the matter, and he said that the relief prayed for must come through Congressional action, and I believe he sent all the papers in the matter on file to the Naval Affairs Committee, where I suppose they are now. We all can see that this is a legitimate claim against the Government. It ought to be paid, and paid immediately, for unless the money be appropriated now in this bill it can not be paid until the next Congress meets, and this delay will prevent the company from getting out of bankruptcy for a year or more. I trust that the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the point of order, so that this amount may be appropriated in this bill and the claim speedily settled.

Mr. CANNON. If this company has, as the gentleman says, a legal claim against the Government, why should they not take their action into court?

Mr. SULZER. The company can not sue the Government in court. The gentleman from Illinois knows that.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; they can sue in any district court, or in the Court of Claims.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is in error. The company can not sue in any court.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; they can sue in the district court under the Tucker Act.

Mr. COCHRAN. No action for damages would lie under the Tucker Act.

Mr. SULZER. That is so; there can be no doubt about that.

Mr. CANNON. I understood that this was a claim which could be prosecuted against the Government.

Mr. SULZER. It is certainly a just claim which ought to be paid now, but the money must be appropriated by Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know that I understood what the gentleman meant. I have an impression that the Government is not liable in damages in court; but I just wanted to find out about this matter.

Mr. SULZER. Well, the gentleman admits now that he was mistaken when he said that this company could bring a suit in any of the courts. Of course the gentleman knows better than that. He may not be a very great lawyer, but he is too good a legislator not to know better than that.

Mr. CANNON. I thought, when my friend stated that the Government was liable, that this was a claim which could be enforced at law. I misunderstood my friend, however.

Mr. SULZER. And I will now say I misunderstood the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a matter which should have gone to the Committee on Claims. I ask a ruling on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order——

Mr. SULZER. Just a moment. Of course I know that a point of order made by the gentleman will lie against this amendment; but, sir, after I introduced this bill I went before the Committee on Naval Affairs to get it reported. The chairman was present. I explained the provisions of the bill; I explained the position of the Government in regard to it—how the company wanted it settled, how anxious the creditors were to get their money, and the company to get out of bankruptcy; and although the chairman of the committee did not tell me in just so many words that he would not raise the point of order if I offered it as an amendment, yet from the way the gentleman smiled at the time [laughter] I was inclined to believe that when this matter came up in the House he would raise no objection to its adoption; but he has, and I now realize the force of the old saying that "a man may smile and smile and be a villain still." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs of barracks, Marine Corps: Repairs and improvements to barracks and quarters at Portsmouth, N. H.; Boston, Mass.; Newport, R. I.; New York, N. Y.; League Island, Pennsylvania; Annapolis, Md.; headquarters and navy-yard, District of Columbia; Norfolk, Va.; Port Royal, S. C.; Pensacola, Fla.; Dry Tortugas, Florida; New Orleans, La.; Mare Island and San Francisco, Cal.; Bremerton, Wash., and Sitka, Alaska; for the renting, leasing, improvement, and erection of buildings in Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, at Guam, and at such other places as the public exigencies require; and for per diem to enlisted men employed under the direction of the Quartermaster's Department on the repair of barracks, quarters, and the other public buildings, $60,000.

For rent of building used for manufacture of clothing, storing of supplies, and office of assistant quartermaster, Philadelphia, Pa., $6,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I offer an amendment, to come in as a new paragraph.

On page 64, after line 10, insert the following:

"That nothing in this act shall be construed into authorizing the employment of any architect or other person not already regularly in the employ of the Government of the United States in planning, supervising, or erecting the building of the Naval Academy or other improvements there herein authorized, at Annapolis, Md.; nor shall plans, specifications, or information from outside parties be purchased for such purposes."

Mr. FOSS. Point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that point of order in time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will reserve it.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MUDD. I will reserve the point of order for a moment. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee want?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope I may have ten minutes.

Mr. Chairman, on page 21 of this bill——

Mr. MAHON. I renew the point of order and insist on a ruling.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I make the point of order that I had taken the floor and addressed the Chair, raising the point of order, and was proceeding to debate the question when the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to raise the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I had taken the floor and was proceeding to discuss the amendment. I submit that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] comes too late in insisting on the point of order, because I had taken the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had not recognized the gentleman to debate the amendment. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] on the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. I will state the point of order, but first I should like to have the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. MUDD. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is clearly new legislation. It is not germane to the paragraph and is not germane to anything that we have adopted in this bill.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. And it changes existing law.

Mr. MUDD. And it entirely changes existing law. The Secretary of the Navy under the act passed in the Fifty-sixth Congress, if I recollect aright, was authorized to adopt complete plans. Those plans having been made in pursuance of law, and having thus been adopted, have the force of law. The gentlemen of the committee will recollect that Secretary Moody in asking for this legislation stated that he could not go a step further without the authority of Congress to change these plans, because the plans, having been already adopted in pursuance of law giving him authority to so adopt complete plans, had in themselves the effect and force of law. I do not know that there is any very strong special objection to the amendment, except that it will abridge the authority of the Secretary, which we have already given. It is clearly new legislation and is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee on the last part of his amendment. The Chair is of opinion that the first part of the amendment is not subject to a point of order, but the last clause, which provides "nor shall plans, specifications, or information from outside parties be purchased for such purposes," the Chair is inclined to think is subject to the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw that part of the proposed amendment, and proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to omit from his amendment the last clause. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MAHON. No.

Mr. MUDD. I would like to know what is left of the amendment?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, there is a great lot left, my good fellow.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts). The Chair is of opinion that inasmuch as this amendment provides that nothing in this act shall be construed into authorizing the appointment of any architect, etc., it does not change existing law, because it leaves existing law precisely as it is. It simply provides that nothing in this act shall be so construed, therefore nothing in this act would give such authority. But this act is not yet existing law, and therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, this does not change existing law.

Mr. MUDD. I merely wish to add that it amounts to but little, if it leaves the law as it stands to-day. If I recollect aright, it has frequently been decided that an act, a piece of legislation, undertaking to construe a law already upon the statute books, is a change of law, and new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. This simply provides that nothing "in this act shall be construed," etc., and this act is not yet existing law.

Mr. MUDD. If the view of the Chair is correct it may amount to nothing. It is tautological, perhaps. Nevertheless, it is giving a construction to law which may or may not be the construction which ought to be put upon it. Therefore to that extent it is new law.

Mr. CANNON. If the Chairman will allow me, the amendment as modified clearly would prevent the Secretary of the Navy from utilizing other than an officer in the employ of the Government in procuring plans for the newly authorized building, for which $400,000 was appropriated, to be erected at Annapolis.

Whether it would affect the expenditure for buildings heretofore authorized or as to those that would be authorized by extending the limit to $10,000,000, I do not know, but it is quite competent for Congress to provide that any money which it appropriates, where it authorizes the construction of a building as it has the technical museum or engineering school building down there, to enact the proposed amendment. So that it is——

Mr. OLMSTED. It is simply a limitation on this appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. It is a limitation on the appropriation proposed as to the extension of $2,000,000, the buildings at the Academy, and certainly, if I understand it, would apply to the new building for the engineering school.

Mr. MUDD. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. I think it would, because that is authorized, and I am inclined to think it ought to.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Did not the first authorization of construction of buildings at Annapolis carry with it an authority in the Secretary of the Navy to make such contracts as, in his judgment, were wise and expedient for the Government; and under that authorization did he not enter into a contract to pay to the architect a certain percentage of what the buildings there would cost?

Mr. CANNON. Perhaps so, on a limitation of $8,000,000; but as to whether it would apply on a limitation of $10,000,000 I am not discussing. I say that in this bill there is an entirely new authorization of a building, involving an expenditure of $400,000. That is legislation. Now, from the standpoint of other legislation, the amendment would apply to that.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. But under the Chairman's ruling it applies to buildings at the Academy.

Mr. CANNON. I am expressing no opinion upon that.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It would be modified, and perhaps not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that if existing law already authorizes the employment of such an architect, this amendment would not change existing law. And if existing law does not so authorize it, then this amendment, of course, accomplishes nothing. Therefore it seems to the Chair that this amendment is in order, and not subject to the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, after having carefully read this bill, and in view of the $2,000,000 item it carries for the Naval Academy, I find on page 31 a basis for this amendment, and I think the House ought, without any hesitation, to concur in its adoption. We have already approved an item of this bill, page 31, as follows:

Plans and specifications for public works: For the preparation of plans and specifications for public works, including such expert aids, draftsmen, writers, and copyists as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary, $30,000.

Thirty thousand dollars for architects in one Department—the Navy. Here is $30,000 to be spent by the Navy Department in architectural work for the Government to avoid paying 5 and 10 cents in the cost of our public improvements to architects in New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, and other cities. Why this official corps of official architects at a great expense and outside architects at a much greater expense?

Now, gentlemen, I want to show you what the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War and all of our Department officers will have to run up against and contend with unless we undertake, as this amendment provides, to protect them from being imposed on by outside parties.

Yesterday in my mail I received a letter from a New York gentleman, whom I met almost accidentally and surely by a mere incident at the hotel here a few nights ago. In that letter he incloses the official schedule of minimum charges of the American Institute of Architects of recent date. It in part reads thus: "The schedule was amended at the Pittsburg convention, November 15, 1899, and further amended at the Buffalo convention, November 4, 1901."

This schedule is headed "American Institute of Architects. Schedule of minimum charges and professional practice of architects, as usual and proper." It is signed, in print, by "Glenn Brown, Secretary American Institute of Architects, the Octagon, Washington, D. C." The schedule thus begins:

For full professional services (including supervision) 5 per cent upon the cost of the work.

A less rate is denounced as "unprofessional," for we find in this schedule this:

The attempt to secure work by offering professional services at a less rate of compensation than another architect is unprofessional conduct.

Now, then, Mr. Flagg or any other outsider who is employed to do this work and is a member of this association, will be bound by this rule or be blacklisted in effect. This rule is, I dare say, well founded. I do not debate that; not at all; but I wish to show you what Secretary Moody must face if he employs an outside architect, a member of this great association.

This bill carries $2,000,000 as an additional fund to the $8,000,000 already appropriated to erect these buildings at Annapolis.

Now, think of 5 per cent on $10,000,000 for plans, etc., paid to an outsider when we have architects who can do this work and pay them good salaries.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] yesterday, in response to my inquiry, said that he was informed that an architect had been employed to do this work who lived in New York, a Mr. Flagg. Now, here are the rules by which Mr. Flagg is to be guided, I dare say, as to his fees, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania says he is a man of repute, an architect of ability. Of course, I assume he is a member of this National Association of Architects, the headquarters of which, it seems, are in Washington City. Now, for every change, for every alteration, for mere consultation with him, for calling him here or sending him hence, or doing anything on earth with him after he is employed, you have to pay extra.

I will insert this schedule in the RECORD to show the various "extras" for which a member of this association charges:

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF ARCHITECTS—SCHEDULE OF MINIMUM CHARGES AND PROFESSIONAL PRACTICE OF ARCHITECTS, AS USUAL AND PROPER.

For full professional services (including supervision) 5 per cent upon the cost of the work.

For partial service, or in case of the abandonment or suspension of the work, the charge for partial service is as follows:

Preliminary studies, consisting of drawings such as ground plan, one upper-floor plan and elevation or perspective view of exterior, special fee according to the magnitude of the work. For full set of preliminary drawings, including the above, and such additional elevations, plans, and sections as are necessary to illustrate the general scheme without working drawings, and including one revision to correct the same, 1 per cent; preliminary studies, general working drawings and specifications, 2½ per cent; preliminary studies, general working drawings, specifications, and details, 3½ per cent.

For works that cost less than $10,000, or for monumental and decorative work and designs for furniture, a special rate in excess of the above.

For alterations and additions, an additional charge to be made, and also an additional charge to be made for surveys and measurements incident thereto.

An additional charge to be made for alterations and additions in contracts and plans, which will be valued in proportion to the additional time and services employed.

Necessary traveling expenses to be paid by the client.

Time spent by the architect in visiting for professional consultation and in the accompanying travel, whether by day or night, will be charged for, whether or not any commission, either for office work or supervising work, is given.

The architect's payments are successively due as his work is completed, in the order of the above classifications.

Until an actual estimate is received, the charges are based on the proposed cost of the works and the payments are received as installments of the entire fee, which is based upon the actual cost.

The architect bases his professional charge upon the entire cost to the owner of the building when completed, including all the fixtures necessary to render it fit for occupation, and is entitled to extra compensation for furniture or other articles designed or purchased by the architect.

If any material or work used in the construction of the building be already upon the ground or come into the possession of the owner without expense to him, the value of said material or work is to be added to the sum actually expended upon the building before the architect's commission is computed.

SUPERVISION OF WORKS.

The supervision or superintendence of an architect (as distinguished from the continuous personal superintendence which may be secured by the employment of a clerk of the works) means such inspection by the architect, or his deputy, of a building or other work in process of erection, completion, or alteration as he finds necessary to ascertain whether it is being executed in conformity with his designs and specifications or directions, and to enable him to decide when the successive installments or payments provided for in the contract or agreement are due or payable. He is to determine in constructive emergencies, to order necessary changes, and to define the true intent and meaning of the drawings and specifications, and he has authority to stop the progress of the work and order its removal when not in accordance with them.

CLERK OF THE WORKS.

On buildings where it is deemed necessary to employ a clerk of the works, the remuneration of said clerk is to be paid by the owner or owners, in addition to any commission or fees due the architect. The selection or dismissal of the clerk of the works is to be subject to the approval of the architect.

EXTRA SERVICES.

Consultation fees for professional advice are to be paid in proportion to the importance of the questions involved, at the discretion of the architect.

None of the charges above enumerated cover professional or legal services connected with negotiations for site, disputed party walls, right of light, measurement of work, or services incidental to arrangements consequent upon the failure of contractors during the performance of the work. When such services become necessary, they shall be charged for according to the time and trouble involved.

DRAWINGS AND SPECIFICATIONS.

Drawings and specifications, as instruments of service, are the property of the architect.

EXPERT SERVICES.

Where heating, ventilating, mechanical, electrical, and sanitary problems in a building are of such a complicated nature as to require the assistance of an engineer, the owner is to pay for such assistance as the architect may require.

Chemical and mechanical tests, when required, are to be paid for by the owner.

SOLICITING PATRONAGE.

The attempt to secure work by offering professional services at a less rate of compensation than another architect is unprofessional conduct.

As amended at the Pittsburg convention, November 15, 1899.

As amended at the Buffalo convention, November 4, 1901.

GLENN BROWN,
Secretary A. I. A., the Octagon, Washington, D. C.

I dare say that if the Secretary of the Navy or any other officer goes out upon the market to employ an outside architect, as is done in all these huge undertakings, he will run up against these iron-bound, armor-plated rules and regulations which start out with 5 per cent upon the face value of the cost of the buildings. In this instance, if employed, this schedule will be a basis of $10,000,000. Five per cent on that, or $500,000, will be the architect's first fee, and maybe more for "extras."

We have also architects in the Treasury building. What do they do? They make all the plans and specifications for every Federal building that is erected throughout this great Republic in all our States and Territories. That is done now, by these splendid professional architects of the Treasury Department, at an annual fixed salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that his time may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, these men make the plans for the building of our post-offices. They made those for the magnificent building in my own city, twenty-five or thirty years ago, that has now soon to be changed and enlarged, plans for which are in the Treasury building now or will be soon.

Why should we leave these splendid architects in the Navy Department, whom we pay $30,000 a year, and those in the Treasury Department, whom we pay well, to go out to New York or elsewhere and burden this Government with a fee of $500,000 or any other fee for doing this work at Annapolis? There is no reason for this; hence I insist upon my amendment.

I regret exceedingly that the Chief Executive of this country, for the purposes of what I am now about to say briefly, is a Republican. If a Democrat, I could not for a moment be accused of being partisan in this matter. Who is Mr. McKim, the architect who has done the work in and about the White House? A New York architect. He has gotten 5 or 10 per cent for spending, in and about the White House, in four months, $680,000 of the people's money. You know what he has done and how badly at least much of it has been done. Tell me that any man can put up anything on God's earth for a building who is able to properly spend about $680,000 from about the 10th of July to the 20th of November! And what have we? Instead of having granite at the east end of the White House, where the tunnel or walk way or entrance, or whatever you may call it, is, we have a plank post there instead of granite. I am thus reliably informed. You all know about the other improvements.

I am not now going into that. I dislike to invade, as it were, anything in the White House, but the fact stares us in the face that these improvements were all done by an outside man, from New York—Mr. McKim, of New York—and the President's new office cost about $66,000. Judging from the way that this work has been done, and its cost and his quality, what can we expect when we employ men from the outside, architects who may be mere theorists? I am informed that Mr. McKim had never before engaged in this particular kind of work, but is an architect who had made his reputation as a builder of centennials and expositions. Sure enough, here is an exposition post at the east side of our White House, which we enter when we visit the President. Instead of having granite, in keeping with the other posts, we have a centennial post, of the kind exactly as they had at the city of Nashville.

Mr. LESTER. To hitch your horse to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly. Now, we have our architects here; we are appropriating $30,000 a year to pay these men. They have done and will do their duty, and if they do not the Secretary of the Navy will immediately drop them from the rolls.

They are in the civil service. Now, why go outside and leave the Secretary at liberty to pay $500,000, or have to pay a sum less than that, to get a man for this purpose, I do not know. Mr. Flagg may be a man having a great reputation, but we know the men at the Treasury building and the Navy Department are men of reputation and ability and the Government year after year has been accepting their recommendations and taking their plans and specifications.

They dare not impose on the Government. They dare not do defective work. They would quickly lose their position. Not so with an outside architect. I have no feeling whatever in this matter. I am doing what I think the public service and welfare demand. I have done my duty. My conscience is easy. I will not have it otherwise. The committee can do as it pleases, but I utterly repudiate such useless expenditures this amendment tends to curb.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment may be harmless, as has been suggested to me, or it may not be. It is more likely to be productive of harm. In that portion of the bill which we have already passed we have given the Secretary power to change or modify the plans of the Academy. We have just voted for the additional amount necessary for its reconstruction, and if he did not alter the plans of some of the buildings at least, he could not carry out the purposes of Congress. But we have given him the power to revise or alter or entirely change the plans in pursuance of the extra $2,000,000 we have voted here. I undertake to say here now that it will be absolutely necessary to largely revise or alter his plans because he will now have to make provision for about 1,000 cadets, whereas he was formerly only required to provide for about 500.

Now, that necessity, everybody will concede, involves a large alteration of the plans, and I fear the amendment, if agreed to, may be construed so as to prevent him from employing in making the alterations the architect whom he has had in his employ for all the other work at the Academy. If I thought for a moment that a regular Government architect could do the work better, or as well, I would have no objection, but I think it is conceded by all those who have investigated the subject that the architect employed in the designing of the plans for the Academy is one of the best in the United States. The language of the amendment is that it shall not authorize the employment of anyone not regularly employed by the Government, and that may exclude this architect.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman tell us what the architect gets for the plans already prepared, for the $8,000,000?

Mr. MUDD. I have no positive knowledge, but I understand the Secretary has contracted with him at a compensation of 5 per cent.

Mr. RIXEY. On the $8,000,000, making $400,000. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be some limitation so that he should not have any further compensation?

Mr. MUDD. My view is this. If the Secretary has made such a contract with him as binds him for the extra $2,000,000, we can not alter it. If he has made no contract, it is in the discretion of the Secretary to make what he considers an equitable and fair contract for the work. I shall not assume that Secretary Moody intends to pay the man extra compensation for doing no work, nor any compensation other than provided by contract legally entered into, but in case he modifies the plans, he should pay him what he thinks proper and reasonable, and I shall assume that he will go no further than that. The great objection to this proposition is that it may prevent the Secretary from using this man any further in the work of remodeling the plans made necessary by the increased number of cadets, and that would be a decided loss to this Academy and the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GAINES of Tennessee) there were—ayes 30, noes 58.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. Those in favor of tellers will rise. [After counting.] Eighteen in the affirmative; not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC WORKS, MARINE CORPS.

Barracks and quarters, Marine Corps: Purchase of ground and erection of building at Philadelphia, to be used for manufacture of clothing and storing of supplies and office of assistant quartermaster (the cost not to exceed $150,000), $150,000; construction and completion of commanding officer's and junior officers' quarters, navy-yard, Norfolk, Va., $42,000; construction and completion of commanding officer's and junior officers' quarters, naval training station, San Francisco, Cal., $16,000; construction and completion of one power house and the installation of steam heat, marine barracks and officers' quarters, navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal., $11,000; in all, public works under Marine Corps, $219,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, my impression is that a point of order lies as to this provision for the erection of the building at Philadelphia, that it is new legislation.

Mr. DAYTON. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will reserve the point of order. I don't know whether there is anything else new in the paragraph or not, for we have nothing here to tell about that. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman, against the whole paragraph.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's reservation of the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The Chair understood the gentleman to state that he reserved the point of order when he first rose.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to say to the gentleman that we are paying a larger sum for rent for this building now than the interest on the money amounts to every year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much are we paying?

Mr. DAYTON. Six thousand dollars a year. It is simply a question of economy for the Government to own this building. In addition to that we will not be able to obtain this location and grounds in the future for the price we can get it now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is some site already picked out?

Mr. DAYTON. The building and grounds occupied now under rent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The proposition is to buy the building that we are now occupying?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; for which we are paying $6,000 a year rent. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And we can buy it for $150,000?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Chairman, as this looks like an economic step, and as it is now and has always been my purpose to economize, I withdraw the point of order and submit the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 6, page 67, the following: "That no money appropriated in this paragraph shall be used for the purchase of plans, specifications, or information in supervising or erecting said improvement."

Mr. MUDD. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GAINES of Tennessee) there were—ayes 21, noes 51.

So the amendment was lost.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LACEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 6516. An act for the relief of Henry P. Montgomery, surviving executor of Granville Garnett, deceased;

H. R. 9632. An act for the allowance of claims of certain citizens of Virginia for damages to their property incident to the encampment at Manassas and march from Camp Alger to Thoroughfare Gap, Virginia, as recommended by a board of officers appointed for the consideration of claims for damages to property by volunteer soldiers during the war with Spain;

H. R. 12141. An act to amend an act entitled "An act amending section 4708 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to pensions to remarried widows," approved March 3, 1901;

H. R. 17052. An act to authorize the building of a railroad bridge across the Tennessee River at a point between Lewis Bluff, in Morgan County, Ala., and Guntersville, in Marshall County, Ala.;

H. R. 17192. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to the city of Buffalo, Wyo., for certain tracts of land; and

H. R. 5070. An act for the relief of Hamilton M. Sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. QUARLES, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6139) to provide for the organization of private corporations in the district of Alaska, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed

Mr. NELSON, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. PATTERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7363. An act to permit the Secretary of State to cause the destruction of invoices.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16021) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract three first-class battle ships carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class upon a trial displacement of not more than 16,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,212,000 each; one first-class armored cruiser of not more than 14,500 tons trial displacement, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful armament for vessels of its class, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,659,000; two steel ships, to be used in training landsmen and apprentices, to be propelled by sail, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $370,000 each; one wooden brig, to be used for training landsmen and apprentices at stations, to be propelled by sail, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $50,000; and the contract for the construction of each of said vessels shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery; and in the construction of all of said vessels the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled "An act to increase the naval establishment," as to material for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are built, the notice of any proposals for the same, the plans, drawings, specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts shall be observed and followed, and, subject to the provisions of this act, all said vessels shall be built in compliance with the terms of said act, and in all their parts shall be of domestic machinery; and the steel material shall be of domestic manufacture, and of the quality and characteristics best adapted to the various purposes for which it may be used, in accordance with specifications approved by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy may build any or all of the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, and shall build the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels, have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels.

Mr. MUDD. I rise to a point of order on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MUDD. I make a point of order on all of this paragraph after the word "delivery," in line 7, page 68, down to line 8, page 69. I wish to be indulged in saying, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to see all this language retained in the bill, but there are other amendments to be offered which would not be in order otherwise, but which might be made in order by reason of this language being allowed to remain. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] now on his feet holds in his hand, I take it, an amendment requiring the building of some of these ships on the Pacific coast—a very commendable thing in him, but a thing which I do not want to see put in the bill.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I make the point that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the question of order.

Mr. MUDD. All right; I will confine myself henceforward to the point of order.

A point of order against such an amendment as I have just referred to, if such an amendment were offered, would be readily sustained, as was done last year, the point being made by myself, as will appear by reference to pages 5641 and 5643 of the RECORD of last session. If the provisions to which I submit the point and against which I have no objection on their merits were, though out of order, permitted to remain, an amendment providing for the building of some of the ships authorized on the Pacific coast might become admissible as being pertinent and germane to what we would thus permit to go in for want of objection.

The point I make against the provision I have specified is that it is new legislation. The act recited here on page 68 of the bill, or some similar act, has been reenacted, I apprehend, in almost every appropriation bill; but the Chair will readily see that the terms of this act and the terms of the acts heretofore reenacted have applied only to the pending appropriation bill—to the ships therein authorized; and when we undertake to say in this bill, relating to ships herein authorized, that a certain act is reenacted that very fact shows that the law is not now in effect; it is dead as to these ships; and therefore a provision recalling it into existence as to these ships must be new legislation.

I am very frank to say that I should be very glad to see the last clause of this paragraph, from line 22 to the end, retained; but if that were the case it would, I repeat, let in other things that are obnoxious; and I apprehend that if this clause goes out here it can come in somewhere else or at some other time without letting in those other things which are objectionable.

Just a word further, Mr. Chairman. The point I make is, I think, clear. The Chair will observe that last year (I refer to page 5641 and the following pages of the RECORD of last session) almost precisely the same question was raised, and the then presiding officer decided the point well taken and cited various precedents to sustain his decision.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to section 531, page 309, of the Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States. It is there stated:

It has generally been held that provisions giving a new construction of law—

That is not the case here—

or limiting the discretion which has been exercised by officers charged with the duties of administration are changes of law within the meaning of the rule.

This last clause, beginning, as I stated, on line 22, in the mandatory language found in it in the words "shall build the vessels herein authorized," etc., is in direct conflict with the decisions that forbid this "limiting" of the "discretion" of the Secretary, as set forth in the section of the Parliamentary Precedents from which I have quoted.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not regard this question as material one way or the other.

Mr. RIXEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] whether his point of order extends to the last proviso of the paragraph?

Mr. MUDD. Yes. Frankly I say I wish it did not, but I include that in the point of order because I wish to keep out something more obnoxious.

Mr. RIXEY. That question was decided during the last session of Congress, and decided, I think, adversely to the gentleman's contention.

Mr. MUDD. No; no point of order was ever made on that.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, if you will look at the first part of this paragraph you will find it provides that "the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract" these ships. This proviso limits that provision, and states that these ships may be built, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy—it ought to be in the discretion of the President, it seems to me—in the navy-yards. Now, certainly it would be in order, when we are providing for these ships, to provide how they shall be constructed and where. We have a right to say that they shall be constructed by contract; we have a right to say that they shall be constructed in the navy-yards; and we have also the right to say that they shall be constructed by contract or in any of the navy-yards, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. The last proviso of the paragraph is, it seems to me, unquestionably in order.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, without discussing particularly the point of order, I would say a few words which perhaps may give information to the Chair. This language has been year after year in the naval appropriation bill. The act referred to, of August 3, 1886, is, I think, the permanent law under which we construct ships, and while I do not think it is material whether it is in this act or not, because being permanent law I think the Secretary would construct the ships under that act, yet we have referred to it year by year. So far as the proviso is concerned, as to whether it is subject to the point of order, to leave it in the discretion of the Secretary to build ships in a navy-yard, that point was decided by the Chair in the debate upon the bill last year. I think the gentleman from New York, Mr. SHERMAN, sustained the point of order on a provision substantially in this form, but an appeal was taken from that decision and it was overruled.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. ROBERTS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. ROBERTS. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not now recollect the conditions under which it was held in order that we could provide for the building of ships by legislation upon a general appropriation bill. It is exceptional. If it touched anything but ships, or a similar matter in principle upon any other bill, it would be subject to a point of order; but away back, probably fifteen years ago—and I think the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. McCreary, was in the chair at the time—a point of order was made upon a provision like unto this. Mr. McCreary held, in substance, as I recollect, that we had a naval establishment under general law, and that legislation which provided for that establishment and for maintaining it was in order, and that appropriation for ships could be made under the rule without previous legislative authorization. Now, if this be legislation in fact, as it is both in substance and in letter, "That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract three first-class battle ships," anything that is germane to that legislation is in order. It seems to me that the provision upon which the gentleman makes the point of order is germane, and therefore I do not see why it is not in order—just as much in order as are the lines upon which the point of order is not made. If it be in order to build a ship, it is in order to say how or where it should be builded. The greater includes the less.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is some misunderstanding as to the scope and effect of the point of order made by the gentlemen from Maryland [Mr. MUDD]. He includes in his point of order all of the paragraph after line 7 on page 68. There are two separate and distinct propositions embraced in that point of order. The first proposition relates to the material for these war ships, their engines, boilers, and machinery, and it provides that the material shall be of American make as far as possible. He takes exception to the fact that the act of August 3, 1886, is referred to and herein specifically reenacted. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the act of August 3, 1886, is the law of the United States to-day with regard to the building of these war ships, and that law provides where the material shall come from, to wit, that preference shall be given to material of American production.

Now, the fact that that existing law is referred to in this act and specifically reenacted, I submit, Mr. Chairman, is not new legislation. On the second point, beginning at line 22 on page 68, giving the Secretary of the Navy a discretion to build these ships in a Government yard, if he deems it proper to do so, I have this to say: Last year when a motion was made to build certain of the ships authorized in last year's bill in Government yards, the point of order was raised that that was new legislation. The gentleman from New York, Mr. SHERMAN, acting Chairman of the committee at that time, ruled that the point of order was well taken, but, on appeal from his ruling, he was overruled, and it was the sense of the committee that it was not new legislation; that his decision was not good. I submit that the Chairman might well, upon this occasion, be guided by the action of the committee on this very question in the last Congress, and I ask that the ruling of the Chair be divided on this question, because there are two separate and distinct propositions involved.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I think that is a good idea. I would suggest that the ruling of the Chair be divided as to the two portions of the paragraph, one beginning at line 7 and ending at line 21 and one beginning at that place and continuing to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph provides for an increase of the Navy by adding certain vessels to it. If the paragraph merely gave to the President the power to have these vessels constructed, it would give him unlimited power, and he could have them constructed wherever he wished, either in contract or in navy-yards. The paragraph first limits the President's power by directing that the vessels shall be constructed by contract. It further limits the power of the President by inserting the provisions of a certain act referred to in terms. That is not the permanent law. It is not law at present. The act of August 3, 1886, was a special act of Congress, providing specifically for the construction of certain vessels named in that act. It placed limitations upon the power of the President in having them constructed.

Since that act was passed, in 1886, whenever in a naval appropriation bill new vessels have been authorized for the Navy, the provisions of that act have been reenacted, so far as they would apply to the vessels authorized in those different bills, by referring to or renewing or reenacting the provisions of the law.

This first paragraph limits the power of the President to the construction of these vessels by contract. That is a limitation upon the general power here conferred. Next it limits the power to construct by contract by requiring him to procure the materials in a certain way and have them meet certain requirements set forth in this act of 1886, which is reenacted by this provision. Then it goes further and says that if certain other conditions arise the vessels shall not be constructed by contract, but shall be constructed in the Government yards of the United States.

These three different things are three separate limitations upon the power of the President in the construction of these vessels. I insist that if Congress has the power to authorize him to have these vessels constructed, and places no limitation whatever upon that power, he could have them constructed however he pleased; and Congress can do that, or it can limit his power in this regard in any way that it sees fit. The restrictions upon the power conferred are clearly in order. No rule is violated by their insertion in the bill. They can not properly be construed as changes of existing law, for there is no general law regulating the construction of new vessels for the Navy. Neither are these provisions "new legislation" within the meaning of the rule. They are "limitations," and, in my judgment, properly in the bill and clearly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is well settled now that the building of ships can be provided for in a general appropriation bill; and whatever we may think theoretically of that proposition, it must be considered as established by the precedents. That being so, an appropriation bill naturally would simply provide that ships should be constructed, and then they would be constructed according to the law already existing, whatever that may be. And, consequently, if in the appropriation bill any provision is made as to how they shall be constructed, if that is in accordance with the law already existing, it is superfluous, but if it is contrary to the existing provisions of law it is of course a change of existing law, and so is obnoxious to the rule.

Now, the Chair is not familiar with this act cited, the act of August 3, 1886, and is not certain whether it provides as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] or not. But that is the law, it has been said, which regulates the building of these ships. Now, if it is the entire law, and if, provided nothing were said here, the ships would be built in accordance with that law, it is of course entirely superfluous to cite that law in this act. But if without citing it the ships would not be built in accordance with that law, then putting it in this act changes existing law, and is consequently, of course, obnoxious to the point of order.

So, inasmuch as the Chair has been unable to ascertain by examination whether that act is now the general law for building ships, it seems perfectly clear to the Chair that the point of order as to that act ought to be sustained, because either it is entirely superfluous or it changes existing law.

Then as to the later clause, as to which the point of order was made, that clearly limits the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, inasmuch as it says where, under certain circumstances, he shall build the ships. Where existing law would compel him to build them the Chair is not advised, but this certainly puts a limitation on his discretion, and therefore is legislation, and is obnoxious to the point of order.

The Chair therefore is compelled to sustain the point of order on both grounds made by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and on that appeal I desire to be heard for a short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. As I understand the decision of the Chair, the Chair puts his decision of the first point upon a ground conceding that the act of 1886 provides a general law for the building of our ships. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] states, and that is my recollection of that law, that it did not provide a general law, but that it made provision for the ships mentioned in that particular act; and, as the chairman of the Naval Committee has stated, from that day until this provisions for building ships have included a reference to this act of 1886. But if the act of 1886 is the law now, then this provision does not change existing law. If that is the law, putting it in this bill to apply to these ships would be a mere superfluity, and would not be a change of existing law, and the Chair in that respect would be wrong.

But now let us take it, which I believe true, that it did not provide a general law for the building of ships in the future, but that it merely pertained to the ships authorized in that act. If that be true, then it must be that to-day there is no law for the building of the ships authorized in this bill. There is no law on the statute books to-day providing for the building of these four great ships that we expect to authorize in this bill. There being no law upon it, how can it be that a provision specifying how these ships, not yet authorized themselves, shall be built is a change of existing law, and yet the proposition to build the ships be sustained?

The CHAIRMAN. It is new legislation, the Chair says.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Then the Chair puts it upon the ground that it is new legislation. Upon that I take issue with the judgment of the Chair—upon this ground: These ships are not yet authorized. There is no legislation touching their construction. There can be no ships built without some legislation touching their construction. I appeal to the reason and the judgment of this House to say if it is consistent to hold that a paragraph authorizing the mere construction of battle ships is not obnoxious, but that one is obnoxious to the rule if it contains provisions regulating their construction. This entire section, the very words in this paragraph that provide for building the ships is new legislation. You can not consistently, in my judgment, hold that part of this paragraph regulating their construction is new legislation without holding the entire paragraph to be new legislation.

So, Mr. Chairman, this is a parallel question with the one decided, as I recollect it, two or three years ago. As has already been stated, a similar question came up last year and the House sustained the position I am now contending for in appealing from the decision of the Chair, there being no law authorizing these ships or touching their construction. This paragraph authorizes the construction of the ships, and says how they shall be constructed. Now, is it right, is it according to the rules and customs of this House to separate that section, that paragraph, and hold a part of it contrary to the rules because it is new legislation, when the entire paragraph touching the authorization of the ships itself is new legislation?

For these reasons, the matter pertaining to the construction of the ships to be authorized comes to the point mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a few moments ago, when he took the position, as I understood, that the real question was whether it was germane to the main proposition or not, the main proposition being new legislation for the authorization of these ships. These provisions touching the construction, and the purchase of material, and containing other limitations upon the power of the Secretary, pertain directly and inseparably to the ships. They are germane to the main proposition and are limitations on it; and I do not understand how the Chair can hold that they are obnoxious to any rules of the House without the whole section going out.

Mr. ROBERTS. Pending the appeal of the gentleman from North Carolina, I ask unanimous consent to offer as a germane amendment so much of the bill as appears on page 68, after the word "delivery," in line 7, down to and including the word "Navy," in line 21. And before that request is put, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that if this goes out——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROBERTS. If this goes out on a point of order, if unanimous consent is refused to this motion, then the committee is putting itself on record as opening up the building and construction of battle ships to foreign material. The main point involved in this section of the bill is confining the material and machinery for the American Navy to American production and American workmanship. I therefore trust there will be no objection to unanimous consent being given.

Mr. MUDD. I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina. Do I understand the gentleman appeals from the decision as to the former or latter part?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. My appeal is to all. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MUDD. I have no objection to either part being brought in by unanimous consent, with the understanding it does not let in other matters that may be germane to it and for that reason made admissible.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have a few words I desire to say in reference to the appeal from the decision of the Chair. I think, with all due respect to the Chair, that the Chair should be overruled in this ruling. If not, then the House is put in the position, under this ruling, of losing its control over the making of appropriations. Now, it has been the uniform practice of this House and the uniform decision of the Chair for many years that we can put a limitation on the appropriation of any money that is enacted by Congress, but in the form of limitation we can not enact new legislation.

Now, the Chair seems to take the view that it is new legislation and not a limitation. That has been decided before and it is very clear. It has been held in the Fifty-seventh Congress by the present Speaker of the House of Representatives that a limitation must apply solely to a present appropriation and may not be made as a permanent provision of law.

Now, what does this apply to, and especially the last portion? There is a distinction between a limitation on an appropriation of money and the enactment of new law. What does this say? The first part provides that any of these battle ships that are built under this appropriation, not a future appropriation, must be made of material made in the United States, and the iron and the machinery brought in here and paid for by the money we appropriate to-day shall not be brought from Europe or foreign countries. Is that a change of law or is it a limitation on the expenditure of this money? Clearly a limitation on the money to be expended by this bill.

What is the second provision? That the Secretary of the Navy may build any of the vessels herein authorized in the navy-yards as designated by him—may build vessels to be designated. In the future? Not at all. It does not apply to any future appropriation, but it says vessels built under this appropriation; that he may designate where they shall be built, just as if you appropriate money to build a new Government building somewhere and you designate where you will erect the building. So, in this instance, you can say as a limitation on the appropriation where this particular money carried in this bill shall be spent, and that is the primary test.

Mr. WATSON. Is not that new legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, I have just read where the Chairman, who is the present Speaker of the House of Representatives, says that the limitation must apply solely to the present appropriation. In other words, the distinction between whether it is new legislation, legislation for the future, or whether it is a limitation on the money now to be expended under the present appropriation depends on whether that limitation applies to the money appropriated in this bill and this bill alone or whether it shall apply to a future appropriation. Now, clearly, under the language of the bill, the provision applies solely to the money appropriated in this act by this Congress, by us to-day, and therefore I say it is clearly a limitation upon the appropriation and not an enactment of new legislation. It would be a dangerous precedent to this House to approve of the ruling of the Chair, which would thereby let us lose the control of the limitation of the expenditures of the public money by Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, nearing, as I am, the end of sixteen years of service in this House, I have never voted to overrule the decision of the Speaker or of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, so far as I now remember, and I shall not do it in this case. I wish to point out, however, to the Chairman very briefly my views on the parliamentary question involved here. I do not believe that this portion of the paragraph which has been attacked by the point of order is obnoxious to the rule, and very briefly I will state why.

In the first place, beyond all doubt, if it is, then the paragraph itself is obnoxious from the beginning to the end. What law is there now in existence that authorizes the building of a battle ship? There is such a law, in my judgment, and it is the law authorizing the construction of the Navy Department. It is the power conferred upon Congress to build a navy, to maintain a navy, and to support a navy. If the narrow view, the technical view, is taken of this paragraph, then there is no existing law authorizing the building of a battle ship, and we are putting it into this statute now, so far as these battle ships are concerned, for the first time.

I understood the Chair to say that the existing law, a law that, as has been stated, and which in my judgment is dead and is functus officio, which has served out its purpose, was the law under which the battle ships could be built. That can not be so, for that law provided for the building of certain battle ships which have already passed away from the domain of legislation and have become the subject of contract. So there is no law, but the general proposition which I have stated, which authorizes the building of a battle ship or the building of any other ship.

The statute of a year ago has served its purpose and is at an end. Then the proposition to build a battle ship or three battle ships is just as much a new law and is just as much open and obnoxious to this rule as is any part of the paragraph. Why enact it? says the argument. Why put it into law if it is already in existence? If there is authority to build three battle ships, where does it come from? If there is no such authority, then that is new legislation and is open to this rule.

So, my point is that we must go back of the statute of last year, must go back of the rule existing to-day, and must stand upon the power of Congress to build a navy; to build three battle ships, to build a cruiser, to build whatever new ships we may want; and it is idle to say that this provision in its operation upon each one of these constituent parts of this legislation is not new legislation. New legislation is to authorize a thing not authorized by any existing statute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we go back and stand on the proposition that it is legislation to build a new ship, regardless of any laws that may have been enacted, which, I understand, is the position the gentleman takes——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then is it not within the power of Congress to limit in an appropriation how such a ship shall be built?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was coming to that; I may as well take it up at once.

Now, having to my own satisfaction established the power of Congress to build one or more battle ships, pursuant to the general power conferred upon Congress to build and maintain a navy, there then arises the necessary inherent power in making such provision, to limit the appropriation, and in all respects to direct how it shall be executed.

Mr. TATE. Conceding what the gentleman says, that Congress has the power to provide for building three battle ships or cruisers, does not that power necessarily carry along with it the power to prescribe how that shall be done?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have just said so as clearly as I could.

I say it is necessarily inherent in the power to build a battle ship to say how it shall be built. It would be idle, it would be a most singular condition, to say that we have the power to order the Secretary of the Navy to build one battle ship, or two or three battle ships, and yet are stripped of the power to prescribe the manner in which he shall spend the money.

It seems to me that this is a most unfortunate position for us to be in. I am not sure that the Chairman has not followed the precedents heretofore established. But that brings back to my mind acutely one of the matters I have learned in connection with parliamentary procedure—and it is very near to being a hobby of mine—that it is unfortunate that in the American Congress, with all the splendid ability that assembles here, we should have an incongruous line of rulings upon these vital questions.

The English House of Commons, which I have watched with the greatest interest, gives far more attention to the rulings of the Committee of the Whole than it does to the rulings of the Speaker of the House; for all the great matters of public policy are disposed of there, as here, in the Committee of the Whole. Therefore a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole runs incidentally with the Speaker; and for the seven years of the life of a Parliament there is just as continuous a line of decisions by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole as there is by the Speaker.

It is unfortunate also that the Chairman does not have time to investigate these questions. They are sprung upon him suddenly, and it is therefore most unfortunate that we can not have more uniformity in the rulings.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: Under this general power, as I take it, of Congress to build or construct a navy, does not the gentleman think it would be in order to establish a navy-yard or a training station or anything which goes to the maintenance and furtherance of the naval establishment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think it would be in order to establish a navy-yard.

Mr. FOSS. Or a training station on the Great Lakes? [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, well, the gentleman is always trifling—always boyish—sometimes inadequate for the condition in which he finds himself. That is the trouble with the gentleman. He goes back to a question that has been already decided, that he seemed to think was not decided rightly; and now he undertakes to befog this question. This is a much larger question than whether we shall have a training station at Waukegan, or not—far greater——

Mr. FOSS. Or at Put in Bay, Ohio?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Or at Put in Bay, either. All such questions sink into insignificance when compared with the question whether we shall legislate to build our battle ships, and stop right there, or whether we may go forward and say how the money shall be expended.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, because we rely very much on his judgment in these matters.

We have here a proposition to build three battle ships. A limitation is proposed that they shall be built of domestic material. Now, is it possible that any parliamentary rule, or any rule of law, forbids us to adopt the limitation as a part of the appropriation, that these ships shall be constructed out of American materials? Can it be contended that we are cut off by any existing law from putting this limitation on the appropriation? I should like to hear the gentleman's answer to that question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What I have said carries the answer to that question along with it. I have said that the original power is conferred by the general power given to Congress to maintain a navy, that a part of their duty is therefore properly exercised when they build three battle ships, and that there is conferred upon Congress as incidental to that power the power to adopt any limitation, whether as to material or location, or anything of that kind.

Is it any more new legislation to say that these battle ships shall be built here and there or of this and that material than it is to say how many tons displacement they shall have? We are here proposing to build some battle ships the like of which we never built before.

Mr. LACEY. Then, if I understand my friend, he thinks that it was right to put this limitation on, that they shall be built of domestic manufacture.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. And, therefore, in sustaining the point of order to that portion the Chair should not have so ruled.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have already stated to the Chair with great deference my opinion of his ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit, the Chair will state that he agrees with the gentleman, that that is in order. He did not intend to rule that that was out of order.

Mr. LACEY. But that has gone out.

The CHAIRMAN. Not upon that ground.

Mr. LACEY. It makes no difference about the ground; it has gone out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Chair is not concluded by that which is covered in an obnoxious paragraph because some portions of it are competent, so that upon an amendment proposed later the Chair might rule differently upon that one particular question. My argument is, and I think I have made myself understood, that the power conferred upon Congress to build battle ships carries with it all the necessary incidents of every description.

Mr. ROBERTS. Material, place, and time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Everything.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, Mr. Chairman, the decision of the Chair is not that the whole paragraph and every part of it is obnoxious and amenable to the point of order, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has stated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what the Chair decided.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is exactly what he decided.

Mr. PAYNE. There will be no difficulty about it, because when the paragraph goes out, the whole of it, on the point of order, it is competent for any member of the committee to offer as an amendment any portion of this paragraph which is not obnoxious. On the decision the matter all goes out, but immediately after the decision it is competent for any gentleman to offer any portion of that as an amendment to the bill, and if he offers that portion which is not obnoxious the committee can vote upon it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me ask the gentleman a question: Is it not a rule of parliamentary procedure that if a part of a paragraph against which a point of order is made is illegal and obnoxious that it necessarily carries all parts of it?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly. The Chair can not distinguish and divide the question. Now, Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Ohio has well said, the provision to build three battle ships is undoubtedly new law and a change of law. There is no question about that. It comes in under the exception to the rule that it is in continuance of a public work. Now, if we may provide for the building of a ship, we may prescribe the kind of ship that shall be built and every detail of every kind. I notice that the first portion of this paragraph, in making these provisions subject to the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, limits it as to—material for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are built, the notice of any proposals for the same, the plans, drawings, specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts shall be observed and followed, and, subject to the provisions of this act, all said vessels shall be built in compliance with the terms of said act, and in all their parts shall be of domestic machinery.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that is simply descriptive of the kind of vessel that is authorized. We are authorized under the exception to build vessels, to legislate on an appropriation bill, if you please, to build vessels, because it is in continuance of a public work. We are authorized to say what kind of vessels we shall build, the description of the vessel, that they shall be built under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, and that the material shall be of domestic manufacture. We have a right to say, when we are describing a vessel and making this addition to a public work, the quality and characteristics best adapted to the various purposes for which it may be used, in accordance with the specifications approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman please point out the distinction between that part of the paragraph which he considered obnoxious to the rule and that part which is not?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see any portion of the paragraph that is obnoxious to the rule, unless it is the concluding portion, which I have not yet reached, and that is this: "That the Secretary of the Navy may build any or all of the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate." Well, that perhaps is not obnoxious, but let me read the other portion:

And shall build the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels.

Now, there is new law, not necessarily belonging to the description, to the design, to the material of those vessels, but law that authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to make certain investigations and to come to the conclusion that there is a combination between shipyards. I think that may be subject to the point of order. I do not see any of the rest of the paragraph that is, and so I shall vote to sustain the ruling of the Chair; but if these other paragraphs up to this last proviso are offered as a separate amendment, I shall not only vote for them, but should vote to overrule the Chair, should he decide that they are obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask my friend if he does not think, with the legislation we have now completed against combinations and trusts, that this provision is in existing law? [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, there has been so much legislation upon trusts, and so many different bills before the House, that without carefully reading what has become law and the provisions of it, I would not be able to answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. Had we not better give the law the benefit of the doubt, then?

Mr. PAYNE. But I want to say to the gentleman that I am in full sympathy with this paragraph in the bill.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no doubt as to the attitude of the membership of this committee upon the first proposition embraced in the point of order of the gentleman from Maryland, relating to the material of the ships about to be constructed. I therefore renew my request for unanimous consent to offer so much of the bill as a germane amendment, hoping thereby to obviate an appeal from the ruling of the Chair upon that part of the point of order made by the gentleman from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand what the gentleman wishes.

Mr. ROBERTS. I asked unanimous consent to offer as a germane amendment the language appearing on page 68 of the bill, after the word "delivery," on line 7, down to and including the word "Navy," in line 21. Those are the provisions which require these new ships to be of American material and American manufacture.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to offer as a germane amendment the words which the House has heard. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will that interfere with the raising of a further point of order? Would that be such business as would intervene to prevent it?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order would still be pending.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is another point of order which I desire to raise.

Mr. ROBERTS. Reserve it, pending this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to consider that reserved.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman objects.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] such time as he desires.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that the act of August 3, 1886, to which reference has been made, is not a general law, but a law providing for the building of ships at that time, and it is a proper inclusion of its provisions, if it is not obnoxious to the point of order, to provide in this bill that the stipulations of that bill for the method of building these ships and the materials out of which they are built shall be placed here. So that there ought to be no objection to that part of the bill.

Now, I desire simply to call the attention of the committee to the distinction between the ruling that was made by the Chair on the last naval appropriation bill and the ruling that is made here to-day. The amendment was offered to this paragraph of the bill a year ago, after the paragraph had been passed; that is to say, after the time for making points of order had passed. The paragraph itself thus became in order, and then an amendment was offered providing for the building of ships in Government yards. The Chair held that that amendment was not in order, and upon an appeal to the committee the Chair was overruled. But there was a very marked distinction between the paragraph of that bill and the paragraph in this bill. In the bill a year ago it was provided that the Secretary of the Navy should have authority to construct——

Mr. ROBERTS. That was mandatory, and this is permissible.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. By contract "except as hereinafter otherwise provided," or words to that effect, indicating that something was left to be done to perfect the provision.

Now, upon that situation of the proposition that was to be amended, I contended that the amendment proposed was germane, because the provision with its exception was already in the bill, however improperly it might have gone in. That exception is not now here. The paragraph respecting the increase of the Navy is subject, of course, to a point of order. There is no provision for some other method of constructing these ships than that therein specified; so that according to the uniform holdings of the Chairman of the committee and of the Speaker it seems to me that the last part of the paragraph is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Before submitting the question, the Chair would like to make a brief statement as to the meaning of his ruling, because it seems to the Chair, from the remarks made by the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Alabama, that there is a misapprehension of the basis of the Chair's opinion. If one part of a paragraph against which a point of order is made is out of order, it is the duty of the Chair to rule out the whole paragraph. So, of course, if one part of this clause against which the gentleman from Maryland raises the point of order is obnoxious to it, all goes out. But that does not prevent, afterwards, the germane portion being put in by way of amendment. And the Chair stated to the gentleman from Iowa, perhaps anticipating more than he ought to have, that in the opinion of the Chair it is not at all out of order to put in this appropriation bill a limitation on the manner in which the vessel shall be built and the materials, etc.—in other words, to describe the object to be appropriated for. But the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Alabama (the Chair does not intend to be controversial) stated, as the basis of their argument, that as there is no existing law for this appropriation it must be new legislation. Now, in the opinion of the Chair, that clearly and and incontrovertibly establishes that this clause is out of order, because Rule XXI, under which this proceeds, provides that—

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order unless in continuation of an appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

It is upon this line for the past fifteen years that it has always been held that the building of ships can be provided for upon an appropriation bill, because they were in continuation of a public work in progress. It is a continuation of the building up of the Navy; but immediately after in that section the rule goes on to say:

> Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order on any general appropriation bill.

We may continue the public work, building up the Navy, by building new battle ships. But the same section provides that no provision changing existing law shall be in the appropriation bill. In other words, you may provide to build new ships. That is an appropriation and does not change existing law; but in making that appropriation we shall not change existing law. We can describe the ships to be built; we can by limitations provide how the money shall be expended upon them; but we can not in that connection insert anything which amends any other law. To the Chair it seems perfectly clear that the provision in this section, that the Secretary of the Navy shall build the ships at certain navy-yards, is a change of existing law, because it limits the power which existing laws give him. It has been held again and again—the decisions are uniform upon the subject—that any restriction on the power of an executive officer is a change of existing law. This section clearly limits his discretion, and therefore changes existing law. And it seems to the Chair that the distinction which is not recognized by some gentlemen on the floor is the distinction between a limitation on appropriations and a limitation on the discretion of an executive officer. Appropriations can always be limited, and in an appropriation bill; but the discretion of an executive officer can never be limited in an appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I have been about as much misunderstood as the Chair thinks he has. The main point that I made was that it did not change existing law, for the reason that there is no existing law for the construction of these battle ships and that the Secretary of the Navy at present has no authority over these ships and has no discretion in regard to their construction. He has no power whatever, and no duty whatever to perform toward these ships until this act becomes law, so that it can not be a change of law or a limitation upon the Secretary's power so far as any power that he now has is concerned, because the authority which is going to be placed in the Secretary of the Navy to construct these ships in the first part of the paragraph is a new power to be given by Congress. I contend when you give him a new power to construct the ships it is not only permissible but the duty of this House to indicate to him how they shall be constructed, and this is a limitation of the power given him in the first instance by this paragraph and does not violate any existing law, and does not limit any present power of the Secretary, but is a mere limitation of the power to be given him by the pending section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will simply state this one sentence—that it has always been held that where there is no law the passage of a law is a change of existing law. They are synonymous terms, and the very first heading of the Digest under that head says:

> The enactment of positive law where none exists is a change of existing law within the meaning of the rule.

That is the line of rulings that has always been held.

Mr. ROBERTS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROBERTS. In view of the recent statement of the Chair, I would like to ask if on both of the propositions included in the section the point of order was raised by the gentleman from Maryland?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland made the point of order against the section from line 7.

Mr. ROBERTS. There were two distinct propositions contained in the paragraph. Do I understand the Chair to say he would treat them as such?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would if the House desires to.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask a ruling on the proposition—a specific ruling.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would not interrupt the House or the Chair with further discussion of this question except for the statement of the Chair to the House as to the point I have made here. The Chair clearly misinterpreted what I intended to say. I did not refer back to the original ruling that made the building of a battle ship in order on an appropriation bill. I merely contended that an appropriation for building a battle ship in each bill is new law unto itself, as the building of a new building is a new law unto itself; that if it is sought to put into the law a provision that would be in the future a limitation upon the discretion of a department officer, that then it would be law, but being a new provision in reference to building a new building on water instead of on land, that it merely amounted to a limitation on the authority as to where and when and how he could build it, and therefore it would be a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Foss) there were—ayes 82, noes 78.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN and Mr. FOSS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 109, noes 88.

So it was decided that the decision of the Chair should stand as the decision of the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the words "by contract," in line 10, page 67. It is something that needs perhaps but little discussion, considering the language used by the Chair. The Chair stated that any attempt to restrict the discretion of the head of an Executive Department was clearly subject to a point of order. This language requires the President to build the ships authorized by contract, restricting his power to build them as he pleases, and it seems to me is certainly subject to a point of order.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is not too late, as the gentleman reserved the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I simply call the attention of the Chair to the language used by the Chair himself in deciding the other point of order—that any language that would restrict the head of a department is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the same point of order lies against this as lay against the other provision, and if the gentleman raises the point of order, the Chair would be obliged to sustain it as to the whole paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the words "by contract" alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ROBERTS. I desire to offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Has the Chair ruled out the words "by contract?"

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Chair has sustained the point of order.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROBERTS. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

On page 68, line 7, after the word "delivery," insert the following:

"And in the construction of all of said vessels the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled 'An act to increase the naval establishment,' as to material for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are built, the notice of any proposals for the same, plans, drawings, specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts shall be observed and followed, and, subject to the provisions of this act, all said vessels shall be built in compliance with the terms of said act, and in all their parts shall be of domestic machinery; and the steel material shall be of domestic manufacture, and of the quality and characteristics best adapted to the various purposes for which it may be used, in accordance with specifications approved by the Secretary of the Navy."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman from New York made a point of order against the two words in line 10, page 67, "by contract," and that the Chair sustained the point of order. I would like to inquire whether or not the ruling of the Chair did not take out the whole paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it took out the words against which the point of order was made, and the gentleman from New York expressly limited it to the two words.

The amendment of Mr. TAYLER of Ohio was read, as follows:

On page 69, after line 7, insert:

"The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase submarine torpedo boats in the aggregate of, but not exceeding $500,000: Provided, That prior to said purchase or contract for said boats any American inventor or owner of a submarine torpedo boat may give reasonable notice and have his, her, or its submarine torpedo boat tested before August 1, 1903, by comparison or competition, or both, with a Government submarine torpedo boat or any private competitor, and thereupon the board appointed for conducting such tests shall report the result of said competition or comparison, together with its recommendations, to the Secretary of the Navy, who may purchase or contract for submarine torpedo boats in a manner that will best advance the interests of the United States in submarine warfare: And provided further, That before any submarine torpedo boat is purchased or contracted for it shall be accepted by the Navy Department as fulfilling all reasonable requirements for submarine warfare and shall have been fully tested to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy. To carry out the purpose aforesaid the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this amendment meets the approval, I think, of every member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STEELE. As we could not hear a word of the amendment as read at the desk, I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. The amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase to the extent of $500,000 such submarine boats as may meet the approval of the Navy Department and come up to the requirements of modern submarine warfare, and may direct that experiments be made on the subject of submarine warfare. This amendment is not in the interest of any particular boat, nor is it intended to exploit any particular designs.

Mr. THAYER. I understood the gentleman to say that this provision was approved by every member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I think so.

Mr. THAYER. Why did they not present it originally?

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Because it was only to-day that we reached our conclusion.

Mr. THAYER. Rather late. [Laughter.]

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. TAYLER of Ohio was adopted; there being—ayes 84, noes 47.

Mr. MAHON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 23, page 67, to and including the word "dollars," in line 4, page 68.

The words proposed to be struck out are as follows:

Two steel ships, to be used in training landsmen and apprentices, to be propelled by sail, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $370,000 each; one wooden brig, to be used for training landsmen and apprentices at stations, to be propelled by sail, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $50,000.

Mr. DAYTON. That relates to the two steel training ships?

Mr. MAHON. The words which I propose to strike out provide for building three ships at a cost of $1,160,000, one of them to be a sailing vessel, a wooden ship. To provide at this late day for putting into our Navy a vessel to be operated by sail is simply going back to the old methods of thirty or forty or fifty years ago. I do not understand why we want to train our midshipmen in the running of ships that go altogether by sail. It strikes me we might as well require a man who intends to be a locomotive engineer on one of our great railroads to practice stage driving for three or four months before going upon an engine. I suppose that these vessels are going to be built on the line of Noah's ark, and to be armed with catapults, and sling shots, and bows and arrows, and battering rams. [Laughter.]

Now, why should we spend a million dollars in building three ships for the Navy of our United States in order to train our midshipmen and sailors in the use of sails? There is no vessel in the Navy to-day that uses sails, and there never will be. We never use sails on our cruisers or battle ships. I should like to know what is the object of this provision. I have simply offered my motion in order to get some explanation.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] that the provision which he moves to strike out is in accordance with a recommendation from the Secretary of the Navy; and while there is no particular explanation as to why these ships are recommended, I think I can furnish an explanation in this way: There are certain things in the training of our seamen that can be acquired on a sailing ship as well as on a battle ship. On a sailing ship a man can be trained in gunnery; he can be trained in seamanship; he can acquire the sea habit and the practice of those things which are elementary in the education of a seaman; and then, perhaps, the most important reason is that it is more economical to train these men on sailing ships than on battle ships or cruisers or gunboats.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it equally safe?

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I presume that the explanation given by the chairman of the committee [Mr. FOSS], weak as it is, is the best that can be given. Here we are proposing to spend over a million dollars to build three ships that will be utterly useless to the Navy. We have just passed an appropriation of $400,000 to erect a school down at Annapolis, or somewhere else, to train midshipmen in the practice of managing the engines on our great ships. Four vessels! And absolutely this committee proposes to send one out built entirely of wood, to put guns on it, and send these cadets out to sea on a wooden ship!

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose a war should break out and one of our cruisers should capture two or three merchantmen of the enemy, how would the sailors get those vessels back to port if they did not know how to handle sails?

Mr. MAHON. Put a cable onto them and haul them into port. But that is not the purpose. We do not want these ships. They are of no use to the Navy. Your midshipmen can get all the muscular exercise on the regular vessels. They ought to be taught how to handle the engines and machinery on the vessels and not sails. The next Congress will come in for more sailing vessels, and in the course of ten or fifteen years we will have the whole fleet of sailing vessels. I tell you where this comes from. There are a few old admirals hanging around the Navy Department—magnificent men—and the old Navy with its sails is still sweet to the memory.

Mr. FOSS. I will correct that impression right here. By referring to the hearings I find this recommendation came from Admiral Bowles, who, by the way, is the youngest admiral in the service.

Mr. MAHON. But the old admirals have persuaded him to do it. [Laughter.] And I want to tell the gentleman further that that admiral, magnificent sailor and officer as he is, has not designed a solitary ship that floats in our Navy to-day, and that shows how young he is. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 68, at the end of line 21, after the word "navy," insert the following:

"One battle ship, or the armored cruiser herein provided for, shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean or the waters connecting therewith; but if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President, from the bidding for such contracts, that said vessel can not be constructed on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean at a cost not exceeding 4 per centum above the lowest accepted bid for the corresponding vessel provided for in this act, he shall authorize the construction of said vessel elsewhere in the United States, subject to the limitations as to cost hereinbefore provided."

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Will the gentleman reserve the point?

Mr. MUDD. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] is recognized.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, this naval appropriation bill which we are now considering provides for the increase of our Navy by the construction of seven new vessels—three first-class battle ships; one first-class armored cruiser; two steel ships, to be used as training ships, and one wooden brig, to be used for training landsmen and apprentices at naval stations.

The effect of my amendment, if adopted, will be to provide that one of these battle ships or the armored cruiser shall be built upon the Pacific coast, and that shipbuilding concerns upon the Pacific coast in bidding for the contract to construct such vessel shall be given 4 per cent in excess of bidders for the same vessel on the Atlantic coast.

This preferential given to bidders upon the Pacific coast in the construction of naval vessels is not a new or novel proposition. When I present this amendment I am not asking for the insertion in this bill of a new provision. I am simply asking for the retention in the annual naval appropriation bill of a provision that has been in nearly every naval bill for the past fifteen years.

When I say that this or a similar provision has been in nearly every naval appropriation bill for the past fifteen years, I want to put the facts into the record that prove that statement beyond all peradventure.

I hold in my hand here now the record of every naval bill passed by the Congress of the United States from 1897 down to the provisions of this bill we are now discussing. Let us see what provisions they have all contained on this subject. Prior to 1887 I believe bids for the construction of naval vessels were open to all bidders over the United States upon equal terms. About that time it was adopted as a part of the policy of our Government to give a slight advantage or preferential to bidders on the Pacific coast. Now, then, listen while I read the provisions of the various bills in relation to this matter. For the sake of brevity—for my time is limited—I will quote the exact substance of each bill, but not the language in full:

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Year of 1887. Naval appropriation bill provided: One of such vessels shall be built on or near the Pacific coast. If it shall appear that said vessel can not be constructed at a fair cost on the Pacific coast, the President shall authorize the construction of said vessel elsewhere.

Year of 1890. Naval appropriation bill provides: One of such vessels shall be built on or near the Pacific coast. If it shall appear that said vessel can not be constructed at a fair cost on the Pacific coast, the President shall authorize the construction of said vessel elsewhere.

Year of 1895. Naval appropriation bill provides: That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President that either of said torpedo boats or one of said battle ships to be constructed on the Pacific coast can not be constructed at a fair cost, he shall authorize the construction elsewhere.

Year of 1896. Naval appropriation bill provides: That one seagoing battle ship and three torpedo boats shall be built on the Pacific coast, provided that the same can be built at a cost not exceeding 4 per cent in addition to the lowest accepted bid.

Provided, That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President that said vessel (or vessels) can not be constructed at a fair cost on the Pacific coast, the President shall authorize said construction elsewhere.

Year of 1897. Only three torpedo boats were authorized to be constructed, contracts to be let to the lowest bidder.

Year of 1898. Naval appropriation bill provided: For the building of 3 battle ships, 4 monitors, 16 torpedo-boat destroyers, 12 torpedo boats, and 1 gunboat; and said bill contained the following provision:

"One battle ship and 1 harbor-defense vessel shall be built on the Pacific coast: Provided, That if it shall appear that said vessels can not be constructed on the Pacific coast at a cost not exceeding 4 per cent above the lowest accepted bid, then the President shall authorize the construction elsewhere."

Year of 1899. Naval appropriation bill provided: For the building of 3 battle ships, 3 armored cruisers, and 6 protected cruisers. That naval appropriation bill contained the following provision:

"One battle ship and one armored cruiser shall be built on the Pacific coast: Provided, That if it shall appear that said vessels can not be constructed on the Pacific coast at not exceeding 4 per cent above the lowest accepted bid, then the President shall authorize the construction elsewhere."

Year of 1900. Naval appropriation bill provided: For the building of 2 battle ships, 3 armored cruisers, and 3 protected cruisers. That naval appropriation bill contained the following provision: "Two, and not more than two of said vessels shall be built on the Pacific coast: Provided, That if it shall appear that said vessels can not be constructed on the Pacific coast at not exceeding 4 per cent above the lowest accepted bid, then the President shall authorize the construction elsewhere."

Year of 1901. Naval appropriation bill: No appropriation whatever was made for the construction of any new naval vessels.

Year of 1902. Naval appropriation bill provided: For the building of 2 battle ships, 2 armored cruisers, and 2 gunboats. That naval appropriation bill contained the following provision: "One battle ship or one armored cruiser shall be built on the Pacific coast: Provided, That if it shall appear that said vessel can not be constructed on the Pacific coast at a cost not exceeding 4 per cent above the lowest accepted bid, then the President shall authorize the construction elsewhere."

Now, this brings us down to the year of our Lord 1903. What do we find in the naval appropriation bill this year? We who live on the Pacific coast have a right to expect that we shall find the time-honored provision that has been in every naval appropriation bill for nearly twenty years. Is it here? No, it is not here. Where it ought to be in this bill there is simply vacancy.

Mr. Chairman, having shown these facts, the burden is not so much upon me to show why this provision should be in the place where it has always been heretofore as it is on the members of the Naval Committee to show why this provision has been left out of the place where it has heretofore always been. Therefore I would ask the honorable chairman of the Naval Appropriation Committee [Mr. FOSS] why the provision allowing a 4 per cent preferential to Pacific coast bidders was left out of this bill?

Mr. FOSS. I will state to the gentleman that up until last year the Committee on Naval Affairs had always reported the preferential of 4 per cent, but last year, in the report on the bill to the House, we left it out, and the reason given at that time was that the Union Iron Works on the Pacific coast and the shipbuilders there had shown in a recent bidding that they could compete with our Eastern shipbuilders. The Union Iron Works, in the bid for a cruiser, No. 9, South Dakota, bid less than our Eastern shipbuilders, the Cramps and the Newport News.

And by reason of the fact that the Pacific coast shipbuilders had shown by actual bidding that they could furnish these vessels to the Government at less cost than the Eastern shipbuilders here, it seemed to the committee that there was no reason for this preferential of 4 per cent. That preferential was put on originally by reason of the fact that it cost more at that time to get the armor and steel from the East, from Pittsburg, than it did the Eastern shipbuilders.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Is not that true now?

Mr. FOSS. That may be true or it may not be true, but on the general proposition, and upon the fact that these Western shipbuilders have shown their ability to compete with the Eastern shipbuilders, I will ask the gentleman whether he believes we ought to retain this preferential?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Unquestionably, I do.

The time of Mr. CUSHMAN having expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. FOSS, it was extended five minutes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The statement has been made by the chairman of the Naval Committee [Mr. FOSS] that at a certain time, on a certain ship, a certain Pacific coast bidder bid less than a certain bidder on the Atlantic coast. Now, I state to you, sir, that one swallow does not make a summer, and a single instance like this ought not to make the entire rule. I claim that you have built up on the very small and narrow base of one single instance a great rule for all future conduct. I say that the gentleman's own statement does not furnish any reason for leaving this provision out of this bill.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. In the bidding this year they bid lower than at least two or three concerns on the Eastern coast for another one of these cruisers.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Is it not a fact that practically all of the material that goes into a battle ship must be transported across the continent, at 75 cents per hundred pounds freight? I maintain that it is absolutely ridiculous—I do not speak in any offensive sense—for any man to claim or contend that you can build a battle ship on the Pacific Coast, after transporting the heavy material by freight, at the excessive freight rates across to that coast, as cheaply as it can be constructed in the East.

A man might as well attempt to tell me that it is not any farther from New York to San Francisco than it is from San Francisco to Chicago. I know better, and so does everyone else. I do not mean to say that the gentleman from West Virginia is not candid, but I do mean to say he is very much mistaken when he attempts to substantiate the claim that a battle ship can be built as cheaply on the Pacific coast as it can on the Atlantic. It is a self-evident proposition. With the aid of arithmetic—addition and subtraction—it demonstrates itself. Practically all of the material that goes into a battle ship that is constructed on the Pacific coast—practically all of that material is produced upon the Atlantic seaboard and must be transported clear across the continent at a high freight rate. Then labor is higher on the Pacific coast than on the Atlantic. Living is higher. Prices of material are higher. Everything is higher; even the class of battle ships we turn out are higher than those on the Atlantic. [Applause.]

Mr. DAYTON. Is the gentleman unmindful of the fact that the Union Iron Works and two or three of the Eastern shipbuilding concerns have substantially combined into one since last year?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I am aware of what the gentleman states; that is, that the Union Iron Works, the San Francisco concern, has entered into a combination with some of the Eastern shipbuilding concerns. But Moran Brothers Shipbuilding Company, of Seattle, Wash., has not entered into that or any other combination. They are an independent concern on the Pacific coast. And they have built up their great shipyard where they are now building a mighty battle ship by reason of the advantage they had in this 4 per cent preferential. And when you take that 4 per cent advantage away from them you remove them from the list of bidders on the one hand and do them a wrong, and you cut your own throat on the other hand by removing from the field the only independent bidder on the Pacific coast. and leave yourself at the mercy of this combination which can hold you up and dictate terms.

The very statement made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON], according to the light which I have, furnishes ample reasons why my amendment should prevail. Mark one thing. When you cut out this 4 per cent preferential you have sounded the death knell of naval shipbuilding on the Pacific coast.

I desire to read and to put into the RECORD at this point two letters that I have recently received from Robert Moran, of the Moran Shipbuilding Company, of Seattle, Wash., in reference to this 4 per cent clause now under consideration:

SEATTLE, WASH., January 29, 1903.

Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are informed that there is a movement on foot to pass the next naval appropriation bill cutting out the 4 per cent bonus which has heretofore been allowed to builders of naval vessels on the Pacific coast. If this is so, it certainly must be in the interests of the Atlantic coast builders that it is done, as there is no question in the minds of those that are informed that it is greatly to the interest of the United States Government to encourage the maintenance and operation of shipbuilding plants at various points on the Pacific coast of the United States which have ample capacity for the construction of any naval vessel.

And to illustrate how this has worked to the interest of the United States Government in the past, we will say that our own plant, which we assure you is equal to anything in the United States for the building of any vessel, would never have been built to the extent it has here in Seattle excepting for the encouragement given to us by the 4 per cent bonus on the construction of naval vessels.

You understand that the labor cost of construction on the Pacific coast is considerable higher than it is on the Atlantic, though putting all of those matters to one side, we have to haul practically all of the material used in the construction of a naval vessel across the American continent and pay freight on that transportation.

This is almost wholly in excess of the expense that attends the building of a like vessel on the Atlantic seaboard, and certainly it is worth considerable to the United States to have constructed, maintained, and operated plants with sufficient capacity to construct naval vessels on the Pacific coast and make delivery here instead of New York or Philadelphia; and, as before stated, it is our opinion that it would be a gross injustice to the Pacific coast shipbuilding interests if any naval appropriation bill is passed without continuing the 4 per cent bonus, as has been done in the past, and we trust you will use all of your energies to accomplish this purpose. We have no doubt but what the Representatives from all of the Pacific coast States will be favorable to helping us in this matter.

Thanking you in advance for the favor, we remain,

Respectfully,

MORAN BROS. COMPANY,
By ROBT. MORAN.

SEATTLE, WASH., February 12, 1903.

Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 5th answering ours of the 29th ult. relative to Naval Committee of the House cutting out the 4 per cent bonus for Pacific-coast-built naval vessels, the reasons given that they have found that Pacific-coast bids have been in some instances lower than Atlantic coast, seems to us to be a ridiculous proposition. It is a physical impossibility for the Pacific-coast shipbuilder to build a naval vessel as cheaply as can be done on the Atlantic coast. And as we wrote you on January 29, it is only justice to the Pacific-coast shipbuilding interests that this bonus should be paid; and it certainly is a great benefit to the Government that completely equipped shipyards capable of building the largest naval vessels have been established and are being maintained on this coast, and certainly they are entitled to a fair portion of the Government's patronage.

As you probably know, at the present time all of the shipyards of the United States are depending almost wholly on naval work. There are very few merchant ships being built, and of course the Atlantic-coast builders are doing everything in their power to gobble up the entire Government business.

If you can be of any assistance to Senators TURNER and FOSTER in this matter we will deem it a favor. It is very important that this be corrected in the Senate before the final passage of the bill, otherwise we doubt if another naval vessel will ever be contracted for on this coast. As suggested by you, we have to-day written Senators FOSTER and TURNER again on this subject.

Respectfully,

MORAN BROS. COMPANY,
By ROBERT MORAN.

In the light of my country's history, in the light of what the Pacific coast has heretofore contributed to the American Navy, there should be a disposition in this body to assist the Pacific coast naval shipbuilders and not to shut them out.

We built the Monterey on the Pacific coast—the ship that reinforced the American Army when it was landing at Manila. We built the Olympia on the Pacific coast—Dewey's flagship, that headed the column of his stately line of battle ships on the day that they entered Manila Bay. [Applause.]

We built the Oregon, if you please. The Oregon! What mighty memories that name stirs within us. The nation held its breath while that sheathed monster of the deep plowed her way through 10,000 miles of ocean foam to be present on that fateful day at Santiago. And as she bore down on the Spanish fleet she looked like the great gray avenging angel of God Almighty. And when there was heard the boom of her mighty guns the yellow rag of Spain sank from sight forever on the Western Hemisphere, and the sky of Christendom was enriched with the folds of a new banner. [Applause.]

Now, I say that the vessels that have been put out on the Pacific coast amply justify my statement here that the Pacific coast shipbuilders have contributed to the American Navy the best ships we have to-day. Why is it? Because in the Eastern shipyards, where there is a great range of temperature, from the exceeding heat of summer to the exceeding cold of winter, the metal mass is expanded and contracted so that it will not knit together as it will in a climate where the temperature is about the same the year round. That has been absolutely demonstrated in the trials and tests of the vessels that have been built on the Pacific coast.

One other thought should appeal particularly to the Republican side of the Chamber. A good many men contend that we should have a ship subsidy. Here is an opportunity to apply the principle of the ship subsidy in one small instance. We contend on this side of the Chamber that there should be protection to American industries. That is what I am asking for in reference to this industry. The protection that should be applied to any American industry is the protection which it requires in order to enable it to successfully compete.

Now, whenever the question has been raised here on this floor in reference to the protection of the industries of the Eastern half of this country we of the Pacific coast have always stood by you in reference to the protection of the industries affected, on which we did not secure the same measure of benefit that you did. The question to-day is whether you will stand with us in reference to the protection of an American industry on the Pacific coast. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MUDD. I shall have to insist upon the point of order, as it is getting late.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to have five minutes to answer the chairman of this committee why they cut off this differential.

Mr. MUDD. I shall not object, if the gentleman will finish in five minutes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think I will finish in less than that time.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman of this committee has stated that the reason why they have left off this differential is because one of the shipbuilders of the Pacific coast had bid less than the shipbuilders on the Atlantic coast in one of these biddings. But if that was a good reason for leaving it off, then it seems to me that in the last biddings, when we did not get a solitary one of these ships, when the differential in favor of the Atlantic shipbuilders was 8 per cent, that is a reason to put it on instead of taking it off.

On July 25, 1902, the Union Iron Works bid on the construction of a battle ship $4,150,000. The lowest Eastern bid was $3,990,000, or $160,000 difference, or more than the 4 per cent differential that we ask here over the lowest bid by the Atlantic coast builder. In the bids for the armored cruisers on October 28, 1902, the Union Iron Works bid $4,365,000, and the lowest Atlantic coast bidder was $4,200,000, a difference of $165,000, slightly under 4 per cent. But what did the Cramps decide to do? They said "we will build both of these ships at $4,000,000 each," or more than 8 per cent less. And it seems to me, gentlemen, if you want to build up the shipbuilding industry of the Pacific coast, if you want to sustain the only shipbuilding plant on the Pacific coast that is not to-day in a trust or combination, you should give us that benefit that will encourage that yard that is able to build battle ships. The citizens of Seattle subscribed $100,000 in its aid. Let us sustain it in its development when it is not in the hands of a trust or combination. If you take away the development, you will crush out the plant and absolutely put the shipbuilding of this country into the hands of a trust and combination. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent to print with my remarks a statement of the bids of the last three or four years.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks by inserting a statement of the bids for the last three or four years in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

Synopsis of bids, showing difference in bids for one vessel.

Battle ships—Advertisement of September 14, 1895:
Union Iron Works $2,740,000

Mr. MUDD. I now insist on the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask if the point of order has not been ruled on yet?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in reference to the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. Let me state it first.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought you had made your point of order.

Mr. MUDD. I reserved the point of order.

What I have to say upon it is very brief. The point of order is that it is new legislation and not germane to anything which has thus far been permitted to be put into this section in the way of legislation. If the Chair will look at page 5643 of the RECORD of last session, he will see that almost the identical point of order was made and passed upon. At the middle of the page he will find I made the point of order on the part of the similar paragraph in the bill of that session, which reads as follows:

and subject to the provisions hereinafter made, not more than one of said battle ships, and not more than one of said armored cruisers, and not more than one of said gunboats shall be built at or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean or in the waters connecting therewith.

Now, there was substantially the same provision as contemplated by this amendment, and the point of order was made on that part of it providing that the Secretary should be required to build one or more vessels herein authorized on the Pacific coast. That point of order was passed upon and sustained. There was no appeal from it, and practically no controversy upon it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that gentlemen of the House can see that that is no "limitation" upon an appropriation which makes it mandatory upon the Secretary to provide, at an excess of 4 per cent over what it costs elsewhere, for the building of one or more of these ships in a particular locality, and that such a provision is a direct restriction on the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy as exercised under existing law; and upon that question the present occupant of the chair has already ruled. It is clearly a change of existing law.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, it was to guard against this amendment that I made my point of order on the other provisions that were not objectionable to me at all. There is one possible ground only on which the gentleman might argue that this appropriation is admissible, and that would be that there had been an amendment offered to which this might possibly be germane. But, Mr. Chairman, if that were true, it is equally true, and it is an elementary principle of parliamentary law, that you can not amend an amendment after its adoption. The only possible way that this provision could have gone into the bill would be to have offered it as an amendment to the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee before it was voted upon. It is too late to do that now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the proposition that is made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD], that this provision was carried in last year's bill and to this year's bill it is offered as an amendment, in my opinion does not make any difference in relation to the point of order being made. The question is whether it is obnoxious to the rule or not. Now, the reason I am so earnest, Mr. Chairman, in believing that the House ought to have the privilege of putting these limitations on this appropriation bill is—in view of the fact that we have spent weeks of this session trying to legislate and hold the hands of the trusts of this country, and here when we have a bill before us to expend millions of dollars of the public money, and we know that unless we limit the terms of this appropriation bill so that it will give outside contractors an opportunity, every dollar of the appropriation will go into the hands of the shipbuilding trust—I say that this House ought to stand on this proposition from beginning to end and insist that we still retain the power to say where the public money shall be expended.

Mr. MUDD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MUDD. Does the gentleman call this a limitation on an expenditure which makes it mandatory on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to pay 4 per cent more for a battle ship constructed on the Pacific coast than anywhere else?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We can limit an appropriation and provide how it shall be expended. That is what a limitation amounts to. The limitation of an expenditure on an appropriation bill does not limit the amount necessarily, but it is a legislative provision as to how the money shall be expended. Of course, in providing how it shall be expended, you can say that so much premium shall be paid for the privilege of building it in one place rather than in another. It might be of great value to the Government to build a ship at a certain point, at a certain time, on the Pacific Ocean, rather than to construct it on the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. DAYTON. I think the gentleman misunderstands the fact that the 4 per cent is in the interest of a firm on the Pacific coast that has joined the shipbuilding trust. I want to say to him that the other firm that has been mentioned has its hands full already with work and in all probability could not make a bid on the work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On that proposition I only know what is represented here by the gentleman who lives in Washington, and I have no doubt he has a better opportunity to judge of these facts than the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. DAYTON. The facts that I give to the gentleman are facts that I get from the Navy Department.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will say to the gentleman that when the Moran Brothers on the Pacific coast first made preparations to bid on a battle ship, the same people who are now to-day contending that they can not build another one were contending then that they could not build the first one. They are building the first one.

Mr. DAYTON. But they are a number of months behind in their contract.

Mr. CUSHMAN. They are progressing faster and better than the Eastern concerns were with similar work when I first took my seat on the floor of this House. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] stated a few minutes ago that he considered it a limitation on the power of the Secretary of the Navy to place a 4 per cent preferential in this bill. I would like to ask him whether he considers it a limitation on the power of the Secretary of the Navy to have a shipbuilding trust take him by the throat and say, "We will build these ships for so much, and you can take it or leave it alone." [Applause.]

Mr. DAYTON. If the gentleman will pardon me one statement, I want to say that the shipbuilding firm on the Pacific coast is a long ways further behind than they are on the Eastern coast. I grant that it is on account of a strike, but the fact is there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, aside from the question of order, I wish to say it is understood and known by everyone in this House that there is not a single one of the great shipbuilding concerns of this country that is not from ten to twenty months behind in its orders to-day. They are not alone in that position. Not only the shipbuilding concerns, but the manufacturing plants of every nature and description are behind in their orders. The question here is simply whether we are going to give an opportunity to independent concerns to come in and bid against the trust; whether we are going to give an opportunity for the Government to say to the trust, "If you advance this price to an unreasonable amount, we will build these ships in the navy-yards of the country." Those are the questions we are to meet here to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, coming directly to the question of order, the Chair has held, and in my judgment properly held, that this House has the right to say that every particle of material that is to go into the construction of these battle ships shall be American material, made by American workmen on American soil. Now, I say that the House has an equal right to say that these ships shall be built in American yards, by American workmen, and on American soil—not in foreign yards by foreign workmen. Does not the same reason apply? There is nothing so far in this bill to prevent a contract being made for the construction of these ships in a British shipyard; but have we not the right to say that they shall not be built there?

Certainly if the Chair was correct in ruling that we might adopt a provision requiring these vessels to be built of American material, the same reason would apply in favor of a provision that they shall be constructed in American shipyards. If, then, we concede that, can we not say in what American shipyard they shall be made? Is there any distinction in the application of the rule? If you can say that a ship shall be constructed in an American shipyard, is it not in the power of the House to say, as a limitation on the appropriation, in what American shipyard? And if we can designate one particular American shipyard, can we not say on what terms a vessel shall be built in that yard? Is it not in order for us to put in this bill a provision to tie the hands of the contractors bidding for the construction of these vessels, so that they shall not enter into a "combine" to defraud the Government? That is simply taking measures to protect the appropriation itself. Therefore I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington is not only in order, but is in the interest of good legislation and in the interest of the American Navy and the American people. I hope that it will be ruled in order and will be adopted by the House.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question? Why does he think that the trusts will not get the benefit of the 4 per cent differential as well as an independent concern?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, this simply broadens the field of competition and gives an opportunity to other bidders.

The CHAIRMAN. It is obvious that the ruling already made by the Chair, and sustained by the Committee of the Whole, that it is not permissible on this bill to limit the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to such navy-yards as may be designated, applies also to this amendment, which seeks to limit his discretion to a single navy-yard; and although the arguments suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] may convince the Chairman and the Committee of the Whole of the desirability of the amendment, they do not touch its legality. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

After line 21, on page 68, insert the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy may build any or all of the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, and shall build the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels, have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels."

Mr. FOSS. This particular provision went out of the bill on a point of order; but I have no objection to it.

Mr. MUDD. I am willing that the provision, offered in this way, shall go in.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "contract," in line 10, page 67, the following: "Or in navy-yards, as hereinafter provided."

Mr. MAYNARD. This bill, under the head of the increase of the Navy——

Mr. FOSS. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the chairman of the committee accepts the amendment, all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIXEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of paragraph beginning with line 7, on page 67, and insert the following:

"That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States, in accordance with the latest improvements in the construction of ships and the production of armor and armament therefor, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to prepare plans and specifications of three seagoing battle ships and one armored cruiser carrying the most suitable armor and armament for vessels of their class, and to submit to Congress a general description of such battle ships and cruiser on the first Monday in December next; and said Secretary, in preparing said plans and descriptions, shall review and further consider the questions whether said ships should be sheathed or unsheathed; what should be the weight and extent of the armor therefor; what should be the form and location of the turrets; whether any changes should be made in the number and kind of guns of the various sizes heretofore constituting the armament of similar ships; to what extent electricity should be used for auxiliary purposes; to what extent, if any, oil should be substituted in place of coal for fuel, and all other questions which have arisen and are now pending among naval architects and ordnance experts concerning the construction of battle ships and cruisers under modern conditions. And said Secretary shall, to such an extent as he may deem expedient, report to Congress in connection with said description his opinion upon the foregoing questions. And the Secretary of the Navy shall at the same time report to Congress what smaller ships should be built, and their probable cost; also whether, in his judgment, it would be good policy to build all or any portion of said ships in the Government navy-yards."

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, pending the point of order, I move that the committee rise. We have been here now until nearly 6 o'clock, and we can not finish the bill this evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee) there were—ayes 49, noes 105.

So the motion was lost.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to know from the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] the ground upon which he bases his point of order.

Mr. DAYTON. Simply because it is legislation providing for an investigation into various matters, and we have now no law authorizing it. Further, because it is not a provision that gives the President or the Secretary of the Navy any discretion. It is not something pertaining to the increase of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Armor and armament: Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for the vessels authorized, $10,000,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if the word "domestic" here is new legislation?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The section reads: "Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture." Now, is that new legislation?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, there is so much confusion that I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman who reports the bill if this paragraph is not new legislation, since it provides that the armor and armament shall be of "domestic" manufacture?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the question, unless the gentleman from Tennessee wishes to be further heard. The Chair overrules the point of order. The House clearly has the power to describe the material which it wishes to purchase.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Chair has overruled my point of order. Now, as to this talking about trusts and everything of that sort——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, now, I have the floor, and there is no use of trust lovers ever trying to drive me off the floor of this House. [Applause.] I am fighting the foulest trust you ever pressed to your bosom, and you press it there. [Applause and laughter.] A giant trust is more at home in your bosoms than love for an infant orphan. [Applause and cries of "Louder!" on the Republican side.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I say—— [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Because I was interrupted by a lot of trust worshipers. [Applause.] Simply because I am striking at this armor-plate trust, as I have been doing for six years, you thus act—you would interrupt me. You [applause on the Republican side] love them on that side, and this is a foul one, and you know it and wince when it is attacked.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, we have passed over one matter, back on page 25, relative to Boston Navy-Yard. It was done at the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], whom I do not now see in his seat.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am here. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the paragraph relating to the Boston Navy-Yard was passed over at my request pending a communication from the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the committee relating to any changes and additions he desires made to the appropriation already provided for for that yard.

That communication has just come. The first is $140,000 for a quay wall leading up to the new dry dock now in process of construction. The second is an increase in the cost of the power and heating plant, to be immediately available, to the amount of $230,000. And, Mr. Chairman, I would move an amendment to that section of the bill, adding the words "quay wall, $140,000; power and heating plant, to be immediately available, $230,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the words "quay wall, $140,000; power and heating plant, to be immediately available, $230,000."

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that we have had no chance to consider these things in the committee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order.

Mr. DAYTON. I hope these amendments will not prevail.

Mr. ROBERTS. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana state his point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is to the provision of the bill making the appropriation immediately available. It is a deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ROBERTS. On that particular clause?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course.

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will pardon me a moment, I would like to place before the committee briefly what the Department says with regard to the necessity of these two items in this year's bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order——

Mr. HEMENWAY. The point of order has been sustained, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to raise any further point of order now.

Mr. ROBERTS. The point of order related only to the words "to be immediately available," and did not affect the motion for the increased appropriation of $230,000 on one item and $140,000 on the other.

I have only this to say, if the committee does not care to hear the reasons given by the Secretary of the Navy, why it is economy and in the interest of the service to have this appropriation made, I am satisfied to go to a vote on the bare request of the Secretary of the Navy. I have here his recommendation, sent to the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 7.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked to return to page 7.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter——

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 67.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman state what he wants to go back for?

Mr. MAYNARD. To correct the wording of an amendment that I offered a few moments ago. Two words being stricken out of the bill on a point of order, the amendment does not now read properly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is now a quarter to 6 o'clock, and I shall object to any unanimous consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let me correct this.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The committee ought to rise and the House ought to adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. FOSS. It is simply a correction.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state to the House the reason for making my request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that he may address the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSS. It is a small matter.

Mr. MAYNARD. I offered an amendment——

Mr. SULZER. Let the gentleman make his correction as quickly as he can.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have been informed about the nature of the request, and I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his objection. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to correct the amendment I offered a few minutes ago, which was adopted. By the fact of two words being stricken out of the bill on a point of order, the amendment does not fit in properly. I desire to strike out the words "after contract" in the amendment, and have the amendment come in after the word "construction."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers the amendment which the committee has heard.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think the gentleman has fixed his amendment right. I should like to hear it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment so that it will read:
"Insert after the word 'construction,' in line 10, page 67, the following:
"'In navy-yards as hereinafter provided.'"

Mr. DAYTON. That makes the construction of the ships all in the navy-yards.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order on that, that it is an amendment. The gentleman is amending an amendment already adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It requires unanimous consent. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FOSS. I object. The words "by contract" were stricken out, and in case the words "by contract" had been left in this language would have been proper; but the words "by contract" having been stricken out, this language ought to go out, too.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not understand that at all. The gentleman offered an amendment, which was adopted by the House, following the words "by contract." Now, while that is a matter of construction as to where they go, and the words "by contract" being in the original bill, in my judgment the construction would be they take it the other place.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17288, and had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there a separate vote demanded on any amendment. If not the Chair will submit them in gross?

No separate vote was demanded.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOSS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that that be extended to all who spoke on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for general leave to print on the bill. For how long?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the time ought not to be over five days.

Mr. FOSS. For three days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For three days. Is there objection?

Mr. MAHON. I object.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report, and ask that it be printed under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman submits a report of a committee of conference, which will be printed under the rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what conference report is submitted?

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate bill 3653, for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 3653, "An act for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lieu of said amendment of the House, insert the following:

"That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully and maliciously kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President have devolved under the Constitution and laws, shall suffer death.

"SEC. 2. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully and maliciously kill or cause the death of any officer of the United States entitled under the Constitution and laws thereof to act as President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official duties or character, or because of his official acts or omissions, or who by so killing such official shall cause such a vacancy in the office by him held at a time when, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, it would be the duty of the person holding such office to act as President, shall suffer death.

"SEC. 3. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully and maliciously kill any ambassador or minister of a foreign state or country accredited to the United States, and being therein, and while engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

"SEC. 4. That any person who, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully and maliciously attempts to commit either of the offenses defined in sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act shall suffer death, or, at the discretion of the court, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than ten years.

"SEC. 5. That any person who, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall aid, abet, advise, or counsel the killing of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, or shall aid, abet, advise, or counsel the killing of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, shall be deemed a principal offender.

"SEC. 6. That any person who shall willfully and knowingly aid in the escape of any person guilty of either of the offenses mentioned in the foregoing sections shall be deemed an accomplice after the fact, and shall be punished as if a principal, although the other party or parties to said offense shall not be indicted or convicted.

"SEC. 7. That any person who, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful killing or assaulting of one or more of the officers (either of specific individuals or officers generally) of the Government of the United States, or of the government of any civilized nation, because of his or their official character, or who openly, willfully, and deliberately justifies such killing or assaulting, with intent to cause the commission of any of the offenses specified in the first eight sections of this act, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not less than one nor more than twenty years, or both.

"SEC. 8. That no person who disbelieves in or who is opposed to all organized government, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching such disbelief in or opposition to all organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, shall be permitted to enter the United States or any Territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof. This section shall be enforced by the Secretary of the Treasury under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe: Provided, That no such person shall be allowed to enter as an immigrant.

"That any person who knowingly aids or assists any such person to enter the United States or any Territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or who connives or conspires with any person or persons to allow, procure, or permit any such person to enter therein, except pursuant to such rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned for not less than one nor more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 9. That no person who disbelieves in or who is opposed to all organized government, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching such disbelief in or opposition to all organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or who has violated any of the provisions of this act, shall be naturalized or be made a citizen of the United States. All courts and tribunals and all judges and officers thereof having jurisdiction of naturalization proceedings or duties to perform in regard thereto shall, on the final application for naturalization, make careful inquiry into such matters, and before issuing the final order or certificate of naturalization cause to be entered of record the affidavit of the applicant and of his witnesses so far as applicable, reciting and affirming the truth of every material fact requisite for naturalization. All final orders and certificates of naturalization hereafter made shall show on their face specifically that said affidavits were duly made and recorded, and all orders and certificates that fail to show such facts shall be null and void.

"That any person who purposely procures naturalization in violation of the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $5,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than one nor more than ten years, or both, and the court in which such conviction is had shall thereupon adjudge and declare the order or decree and all certificates admitting such person to citizenship null and void. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the courts having jurisdiction of the trial of such offense to make such adjudication.

"That any person who knowingly aids, advises, or encourages any such person to apply for or to secure naturalization or to file the preliminary papers declaring an intent to become a citizen of the United States, or who in any naturalization proceeding knowingly procures or gives false testimony as to any material fact, or who knowingly makes an affidavit false as to any material fact required to be proved in such proceeding, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not less than one nor more than ten years, or both.

"The foregoing provisions concerning naturalization shall not be in force until ninety days after the approval hereof."

And the House agree to the same.

JOHN J. JENKINS,
JESSE OVERSTREET,
DAVID A. DE ARMOND,
Managers on the part of the House.

GEORGE F. HOAR,
CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The managers on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon Senate bill 3653, entitled "An act for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes," have reached a full and complete agreement, which is set out literally and in full in the report which accompanies this statement.

JOHN J. JENKINS,
JESSE OVERSTREET,
DAVID A. DE ARMOND,
Managers on the part of the House.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks, made on the 11th of this month, in reference to a national park in the State of Washington.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD his remarks, made on the 11th of this month, in reference to a national park in Washington. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PRIVATE CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (S. 6139) to provide for the organization of private corporations in the district of Alaska, with House amendment, disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the following conferees will be appointed on the part of the House: Mr. WARNER, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. MCLAIN.

H. R. 15767. An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania.

FIFTH AND SIXTH REGIMENTS DELAWARE VOLUNTEERS.

By unanimous consent, reference of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 201) to restore the status of the Fifth and Sixth Regiments Delaware Volunteers, who served during the civil war, was changed from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MONDELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the invitation extended to the Congress of the United States by the National Commission of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition and by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company to attend the dedicatory ceremonies of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, to be held at St. Louis, Mo., April 30 and May 1 and 2, 1903, be, and is hereby, accepted.

That the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a committee to consist of 7 Senators and 11 Representatives elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress, to attend the dedicatory ceremonies referred to, and to represent the Congress of the United States on the occasion of the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Territory of Louisiana at St. Louis, Mo., April 30 and May 1 and 2, 1903.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the committee later.

MRS. JOHN L. SHEPPARD.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 445, for the payment of $35.47 to Mrs. John L. Sheppard for clerk hire due to the late Representative John L. Sheppard for eleven days in October, 1902, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption with the following amendments:

After the word "Sheppard," in the second line, insert the words "widow of the late Representative John L. Sheppard."

After the word "cents," in the fourth line, strike out the words "for services rendered as;" and after the word "clerk," in the fourth line, insert the words "hire due."

Representative Sheppard died October 11, 1902. There was due him an allowance of $35.47 for clerk hire, which the resolution proposes to pay to Mrs. John L. Sheppard, his widow.

It is the usual resolution in such cases.

Resolution 445.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to pay to Mrs. John L. Sheppard, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $35.47 for services rendered as clerk to the late Representative John L. Sheppard from October 1 to October 11, 1902, inclusive.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is simply a resolution to pay the widow of the late John L. Sheppard the amount due for clerk hire between the first of the month and the time of his death. It is in the usual form.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was considered; and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BARTLETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RALF DENT.

Mr. BARTLETT. I also offer, Mr. Speaker, a privileged report from the same committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 323, for the payment to Ralf Dent of $192.50 for services rendered as a page in the House from January 1, 1901, to March 18, 1902, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption with the following amendment:

In line 5 strike out "one" and insert "two."

It appears that the beneficiary named in the resolution served as a page in the House from January 1, 1902, to March 18, 1902, without compensation. A resolution for his employment as a page was considered by your committee and was authorized to be favorably reported by the House, but was never considered by the House. Dent, however, gained the impression that his services were authorized and performed the duties of a page during the time stated.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Ralf Dent the sum of $192.50, for services rendered as a page from January 1, 1901, to March 18, 1902.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BARTLETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 7351. An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the State of Pennsylvania;

S. 7002. An act for the relief of the contractor or his legal representatives for the construction of the light-draft monitor Etlah;

S. 5955. An act for the relief of the representatives of M. F. Merritt, deceased;

S. 6681. An act for the relief of Rudolf Herbst; and

S. 3838. An act to refer to the Court of Claims the claim for the Tunxis.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of following titles were taken from the Speaker's tables and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 6681. An act for the relief of Rudolf Herbst—to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 3838. An act to refer to the Court of Claims the claim for the Tunxis—to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 265. An act to establish a light-house and fog-signal station on Burrows Island, State of Washington;

S. 7277. An act granting an increase of pension to Elbert H. Dagnall;

S. 7076. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles L. Pinkham;

S. 7003. An act granting an increase of pension to Sarah C. Merrell;

S. 6985. An act granting an increase of pension to George Cummings;

S. 6984. An act granting an increase of pension to Maria A. Marden;

S. 6983. An act granting an increase of pension to Gilman B. Johnson;

S. 6982. An act granting an increase of pension to Linda F. Moulton;

S. 6981. An act granting an increase of pension to Lorenzo P. Duncklee;

S. 6941. An act granting an increase of pension to James Montz;

S. 6876. An act granting a pension to Lavinia F. Poiron;

S. 7060. An act granting an increase of pension to Ann M. Jackman;

S. 6845. An act granting an increase of pension to Martin G. Cushing;

S. 6843. An act granting an increase of pension to A. Paul Horne;

S. 7176. An act granting an increase of pension to Jennie W. Rhoades;

S. 7166. An act granting an increase of pension to Fanny Farmer;

S. 7145. An act granting an increase of pension to Rosetta E. Rafferty;

S. 7100. An act granting an increase of pension to Maggie V. Holstein;

S. 7077. An act granting an increase of pension to Cyrus B. Norris;

S. 7245. An act amending the act of June 19, 1888, providing for the erection of a public building at Bridgeport, Conn.;

S. 7182. An act granting an increase of pension to William H. McHenry;

S. 7207. An act granting an increase of pension to May Mosher Chase;

S. 7202. An act granting an increase of pension to Fanny B. Orwan; and

S. 7186. An act granting a pension to Mary C. Couch.

SUPERINTENDENT OF CLERK'S DOCUMENT ROOM.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read House resolution No. 293, with accompanying report, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ in the Clerk's document room, from and after the date of the passage of this resolution, in addition to the present force therein employed, a superintendent of the Clerk's document room, who shall have charge of said Clerk's document room, and to pay him a salary or $1,800 per annum, which salary shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives until provision is made for it in an appropriation law.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 293, authorizing the employment of a superintendent of the Clerk's document room, in addition to the present force there employed, at a salary of $1,800 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption.

This resolution, if adopted, will create a new position of superintendent of Clerk's document room. Unless, however, further provision than is made by the resolution for the employment of such superintendent beyond the 4th day of March, when this Congress will expire, is incorporated in one of the general appropriation bills, such employment, under the resolution, can not extend beyond that date.

All requisitions for the binding of documents are made upon the Public Printer through the Clerk's document room. The present available force employed on this work is not adequate, according to a statement of the Clerk of the House made before your committee, and he strongly recommends the employment of a person to superintend the work, which, he states, has grown to large proportions, and which requires systematic and intelligent bookkeeping to properly and expeditiously handle. Your committee believe that the important nature and volume of this work fully bears out the statement of the Clerk of the House and justifies the adoption by the House of the resolution herewith favorably reported.

Mr. MADDOX. I should like to hear some explanation of this resolution.

Mr. HUGHES. This resolution provides for the employment of a superintendent of the Clerk's document room. They have now employed in that room a clerk at $1,440, an assistant at $900, and a laborer assigned as clerk at $720. The Clerk of the House now designates men who are now employed in other capacities to do the work in the Clerk's document room, as the present force can not do the work of that room. The Committee on Accounts, after fully investigating this matter, have reported this resolution favorably. In the index room they have a clerk at $2,000; in the enrolling clerk's room they have a clerk at $2,250, and the newspaper clerk gets $2,000. The resolution clerk gets $2,000, and the distributing clerk $1,800. This particular clerk gets only $1,440.

Prior to the time when under the resolution of Mr. Dockery, a former member of this House, things were "reconstructed" in the House, there were employed in the Clerk's document room a clerk at $2,000, one at $1,600, one at $1,200, and one at $720. Now, there is double the work to do that there was formerly, and, as I have stated, the force of that room consists only of a clerk at $1,440, an assistant at $900, and a laborer (designated as a clerk) at $720.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDOX. How does it happen that this work is double now what it formerly was?

Mr. HUGHES. Because there is more work to do. The binding law makes at least three times as much to do as there was at this time a year ago.

Mr. MADDOX. What is the character of the work?

Mr. HUGHES. It is the binding of different kinds of books issued by the House.

Mr. MADDOX. Does the gentleman undertake to say that there are three times as many books bound now as there were this time last year?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir. This time two years ago there were only 3,750 requests for binding; now there are 5,145.

Mr. MADDOX. Who is it that is authorized to make these requests, outside of members of Congress?

Mr. HUGHES. No one outside of members of Congress. Members are improving their opportunities in this respect. Take, for instance, the Congressional Directory, which is now furnished as a bound book on the request of members, where formerly it was supplied in paper.

Mr. MADDOX. Is this position to be a permanent one?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir; it is to be a permanent position in the Clerk's document room.

Mr. MADDOX. And you really think that the Clerk needs this assistance?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir; I really think he needs it. I know that he does.

Mr. MADDOX. Can you not find some one of the employees around here who are doing nothing, and furnish him with something to do?

Mr. HUGHES. They have no employee in the Clerk's office that can now be assigned to this work.

Mr. MADDOX. Then you can not find anyone around the Capitol to assign to this work?

Mr. HUGHES. No; and the present law prevents it, only in case of emergency, and this is permanent work.

Mr. MADDOX. Have you this gentleman already selected?

Mr. HUGHES. No, sir.

Mr. MADDOX. How do you know that you are going to get one on the outside?

Mr. HUGHES. Well, I think we can.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from West Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish to say that I was present at the meeting of the Committee on Accounts when action was taken on this resolution. The Clerk of the House and other officials connected with this work have been before the committee. We have heard their statements as to the necessity for this position. I do not know anything else to be done except for the House to concur in this resolution authorizing the employment of this clerk at the salary named. He is said to be necessary to carry out the work of the House. We have therefore reported this resolution; and I know no reason why it should not be voted for.

Mr. FLEMING. Will the gentleman from West Virginia yield to me for a question?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLEMING. The gentleman in charge of this resolution, in enumerating the different places in this department a few moments ago, mentioned one of the officers as a "newspaper clerk."

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, no; not in this department.

Mr. FLEMING. Well, will the gentleman please give the House some information as to the duties of that "newspaper clerk?" Does he do duty as a newspaper man, or is he a reporter? What are his duties? I should like to have some information on that point. I did not know that we had a "newspaper clerk."

Mr. HUGHES. We have him on the list as a newspaper clerk.

Mr. FLEMING. How much salary does he receive?

Mr. HUGHES. Two thousand dollars a year. As I understand, he has something to do with the Journal.

Mr. FLEMING. Does the gentleman mean the RECORD?

Mr. HUGHES. No.

Mr. FLEMING. And you call him a newspaper clerk?

Mr. HUGHES. That is the way he is designated on the list, but that has nothing to do with these clerks in the document room.

Mr. FLEMING. I thought perhaps it was the gentleman in the Clerk's office who keeps the files of newspapers.

Mr. HUGHES. No.

Mr. FLEMING. I thought the salary was rather excessive for that kind of work.

Mr. HUGHES. No; he has nothing to do with the Clerk's document room at all. I merely called that over in calling the list of the different clerks they have in the different departments here to do the work of the House.

Mr. FLEMING. Then, as a matter of fact, the clerk who is designated the newspaper clerk there is the one who edits the RECORD?

Mr. HUGHES. The clerk who is designated the newspaper clerk has nothing to do with this resolution at all.

Mr. FLEMING. I understand that; but I was asking for information.

Mr. HUGHES. What is the question?

Mr. FLEMING. Whether or not the clerk designated as the newspaper clerk is the editor of the RECORD.

Mr. HUGHES. That is my understanding about it, though I am not positive.

Mr. FLEMING. It is a strange name to give to such a clerk.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to ask the gentleman, who seems to be on the Committee on Accounts, whether the Doorkeeper and Sergeant-at-Arms and Clerk have made their reports to him monthly under oath, as the law requires them to do, of the number of employees they have and what they are doing? Has the gentleman required that?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman can state——

Mr. HUGHES. That is the duty of the chairman of the committee, and I can not tell.

Mr. BARTLETT. I can state that it has been done.

Mr. MADDOX. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have the floor now. Is it not a fact that the necessity for the man who is wanted now arises because of this short session and our being so close to adjournment? That is, because of the press of business right now, and if you had one until Congress adjourned, is it not a fact that you would have no necessity for him afterwards?

Mr. HUGHES. No; that is not a fact. This man will be employed during the whole year. There is as much or nearly as much binding done during the vacation as while Congress is in session.

Mr. MADDOX. I will ask the gentleman if he has investigated this matter himself?

Mr. HUGHES. I have.

Mr. MADDOX. To see whether we need this man?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I have.

Mr. MADDOX. And the gentleman states in his place, as we say in court——

Mr. HUGHES. As a Congressman representing the Fourth Congressional district of West Virginia I state that this clerk is absolutely needed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HUGHES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHARLES A. SPIRK.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Charles A. Spirk the sum of $100, for services rendered as clerk to the late Representative J. N. W. Rumple from January 1 to January 31, 1903, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HUGHES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HARRISON EDELIN.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following resolution, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay Harrison Edelin, out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, at the rate of $60 per month for the sessions of this Congress for services as janitor to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. How often has this committee met this Congress?

Mr. HUGHES. About once every two weeks.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not understand to what committee the gentleman from Georgia refers.

Mr. MADDOX. The Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions is what I understood the gentleman to say. How often does that committee meet?

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, I could not tell. That is a question which I think the chairman of the committee [Mr. TAWNEY] could perhaps answer.

Mr. MADDOX. Let me ask this question: How is it possible for the gentleman on the Committee on Accounts to bring in this resolution here and ask for this pay unless he knows something about this thing?

Mr. HUGHES. Well, we do know something about that.

Mr. MADDOX. Did not you investigate this at all?

Mr. HUGHES. We know and feel that this man is entitled to this pay, for he has done the work.

Mr. MADDOX. Then the gentleman knows he has done the work.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Well, then, how often did the committee meet, and how much work has the man done?

Mr. HUGHES. It is not a part of my duties to keep the record of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions and how often they meet.

Mr. MADDOX. Well, the gentleman knows the work was done.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HUGHES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL CLERK, COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the Committee on Accounts, I call up House resolution 431.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from the Committee on Accounts calls up the following, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an additional clerk to said committee, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day during the remainder of the present session.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY C. SMITH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ELIZABETH NORRIS.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I also call up the following from the same committee.

The SPEAKER. The same gentleman also calls up the following from the same committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Elizabeth Norris, widow of Eppa Norris, deceased, late an employee in the heating and ventilating department of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' pay at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum, not exceeding $250, on account of expenses of his last illness and burial.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY C. SMITH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE PRESIDENT M'KINLEY.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, by direction of the Committee on Printing, calls up the following, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read House concurrent resolution 69, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in the form of eulogies 24,000 copies of the oration delivered by the Hon. John Hay in the Hall of the House of Representatives during the exercises in memory of the late President McKinley on February 27, 1902: 16,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 8,000 for the use of the Senate.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I also offer the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota also calls up the following from the same committee:

The Clerk read House concurrent resolution 73, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound of the statistics and tabulated data collected and prepared by the United States Civil Service Retirement Association, relative to retirement of employees in the classified civil service of the Government, 3,000 copies, 2,000 of which shall be for the use of the House and 1,000 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to have some explanation in regard to this. What is this?

Mr. HEATWOLE. These data have been prepared by the association, in view of the fact that there have been several bills before Congress looking toward the retirement of employees of the Government. It will be valuable as a work of reference.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is this—an argument in favor of a civil pension?

Mr. HEATWOLE. It is neither in favor nor against it. It is merely information.

Mr. HEPBURN. At whose instance was it procured?

Mr. HEATWOLE. At the instance of this Civil Service Retirement Association. I will call on the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think I can give the gentleman the information he desires. Three or four Congresses ago, as the gentleman will remember, there were several bills introduced relative to the question as to whether the elderly superannuated men in the civil service could be removed and taken care of by a retirement fund which would be formed by taking a certain percentage from the salary of each person in the classified service. At that time the committee of which I was a member concluded that the scheme was impracticable, because it would cost more and take a larger percentage from the salary of each person in the service than they would be willing to give. Therefore it could not be done. But after the committee abandoned it it attracted the attention of the clerks in the different departments, who looked at it not of course from the point of view of the Government, but from their own selfish point of view, very properly, hoping that they might in some way prepare a scheme by which they could be retired, paying a certain percentage of their salaries during their service which would support them after they were turned out.

So they formed an association, which was voluntary of course, having no connection with Congress. In carrying out their purpose they sent out, I think over 20,000 postal cards to the clerks of all the departments in Washington, and obtained the ages, length of service, salaries, and many other details, and in that way got a vast amount of information bearing on this question. They expected to get it in time to present to Congress two years ago, but found it was such an enormous undertaking that they were not able to do so. They have been over three years in procuring a very large amount of information. It is not for me to say at this time what the tendency of it is, whether it proved favorable to their scheme or unfavorable. It simply finds the facts, which the clerks themselves procured. They went to the expense of having an auditor or actuary come over from one of the big insurance companies in New York, taking their facts and tabulating them and drawing the mathematical inference from them. Now, it seems to them, and when they consulted me about it, it seemed to me, here was a vast mass of valuable information which had been procured in a manner in which Congress could not obtain it, because it was voluntary, as they were giving the exact facts—here was a vast amount of information which was bearing upon an interesting subject, and therefore it seemed to me that it was very important to have it published. That is all this is.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that all that information is in the Blue Book?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No, sir; I do not think it is.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it anything more than the time when appointed, the time of service, and compensation?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have not studied the Blue Book closely myself, but I do not think the Blue Book gives the age of a man when he entered the service or the salary he received at different periods of his service. This gives all these facts.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not true that this committee of clerks have abandoned all their expectations of being able to reach a common plan, and have not they abandoned the whole subject, believing that it was an impracticable thing?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not think they have, Mr. Speaker. I will say to the gentleman that last fall I had a consultation with them, and I will confess I came to the conclusion, personally, that I thought it was impracticable. I think it requires a larger percentage to be given up by the different clerks than they would be willing to surrender, or than Congress would think was fair. I think, from my examination, these facts prove the plan is impracticable, but I do not think the clerks have come to that conclusion. But whether or not, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that when you can have the information which these men have procured at a great deal of expense on the belief it might support their claim, though we do not think it does, I think it is a valuable publication to have in permanent form.

Mr. HEATWOLE. It is a collection of facts in condensed form for the information of Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will permit me, I believe the getting of this information began about three years ago.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is my recollection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Are the changes that have been going on ascertainable by this report?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Going on when?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The deaths among these clerks.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. During these three years? As to that I am not sure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If that is not shown, then it is absolutely worthless.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not think I have made myself clear. This does not state what has been going on during the three years. This took the membership of the clerks at one date—I do not know when it was; probably two years ago—and gives all the clerks in the civil service of the Government at that date. They sent a postal card to every clerk. I wish I had one of those postals. The inquiry was as to the age, the State, when he entered the service, what he received when he first entered the service, his promotions, and gave all the facts about the service of all the clerks of the departments of that date.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, what value is it to know when a man entered the service, how long he has served, or what his promotions were?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It seems to me of value upon the question as to whether it is possible to in any way take from these gentlemen, these clerks, a percentage of their salary so as to make a fund which they themselves contribute to and establish which will go to make up a retirement fund. It is very important to find out what they are getting, how old they are, how old they were when they went into the service, and thus get the average of all these facts.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And then if there is any appeal to this House to pass a law this information will be forthcoming in proposing a civil pension?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it is likely to have that effect. I think it is more likely to have an effect such as it had on me—instead of laying the foundation for that which I admit I was originally hopeful of, it has to me proved that it was impossible.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be well to accept your judgment and get rid of this thing?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The country might not accept my judgment, and others may come later with a different feeling about this, and it seems to me then here will be a body of facts that has been procured at all this expense and trouble, and it will prevent the necessity of going over it all again.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am highly content with your opinion on the subject. I would like to ask if this is a privileged report?

Mr. HEATWOLE. It is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How did it come to be privileged?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Because it provides for printing for the House and Senate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not understand this to be an official document. It came to you through private sources. Has the House ever ordered it sent to the committee?

Mr. HEATWOLE. No; it has never been sent to the committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the consideration of this document as a privileged report.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I think, Mr. Speaker, that comes too late.

Mr. STEELE. It is pretty late now for a point of order to be made.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I think the gentleman from Ohio misunderstands the purpose of this resolution. It has been thoroughly considered by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have in my hand several bills that have been introduced in past Congresses giving the right by the sanction of the United States Government to the plan of retiring superannuated persons in the Government employ, and also the establishment of a civil pension list broader than that, and also upon the subject of insurance by the department people with the sanction of the United States Government. Now, this proposes to publish the data that has been gathered by those who are interested employees to present in the form of a special plea their side of the case.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Oh, no; it does not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It embodies matters which bear on the question of longevity and experience and the tables of the insurance companies.

Mr. HEATWOLE. It can be used against as well as for the proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Can be used against? Does not the gentleman know that the proposition has been before the House and has failed to receive its sanction on three or four separate occasions? The House now in its sentiment is against the insurance plan of employees, and against the civil service pension list, and needs no further fortification in that position. Why should we publish the data that can be used against them as well as in their favor? If the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from Minnesota can give any good reason why the money of the people should be expended for printing data that can be used in favor of their proposition, at their suggestion, and upon their invitation, I would like to know why it should be so expended.

Mr. HEATWOLE. These facts have not been gathered by the department clerks, but by an association outside of the departments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman say that those propositions have not been offered on the part of the department clerks in favor of this proposition several times, and that they have not been discountenanced by the House on a vote? And is not this an effort to get the matter again before the House?

Mr. HEATWOLE. No; if it were, I would not be in favor of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then what is the purpose of it?

Mr. HEATWOLE. What is the purpose of printing any public document?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. When Government publications are made, it is always for some good reason, and that printing has been done in the past is no reason for this action. I thought the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] had arrived at the idea that we had been doing a good deal too much printing, and I stand with him on that proposition, and I am sorry to see him stand here and advocate a proposition clearly in the interest of a civil pension retirement list and insurance by the United States Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There has been so much confusion this morning that I could not hear what the gentleman from Minnesota had to say, and I have not gathered whether the Chair has submitted this motion to the House as a privileged question or not. It escaped me if he did. I desire to ask the Chair whether the motion has been submitted to the House as a privileged question? If not, I think it is still in order to make the point that the question is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. It was presented, read, no objection made, and debated for nearly an hour, and it is too late now for the point of order to be made. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HEATWOLE) there were—ayes 54, noes 99.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

REPORT ON NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I also call up House resolution 356.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter there be printed and bound in cloth of the Annual Report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in addition to the usual number, 500 copies of the report proper, including the proceedings of the Board of Managers, and 150 copies of the record of members, and 500 copies, bound in paper, of the annual report of the assistant inspector-general of the State Homes.

The following amendment, reported by the committee, was read:

After the word "Homes," in line 8, add "for the use of the Home."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

DIGEST OF PARDONS, ETC.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I also call up the joint resolution (S. R. 148) to provide for the printing of a digest of the laws, decisions, and opinions relating to pardons and other acts of executive clemency under the United States and the several States.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That there be printed the usual number of copies of a digest of the laws and constitutional provisions now in effect of the United States and of the several States, the decisions of the courts of the United States and of the several States, and the opinions of the Attorneys-General of the United States relating to the extent of the pardoning power and the legal effect of pardons and other acts of executive clemency under the constitutions and laws of the United States and of the several States, said digest to include a summary of the laws now in effect of the United States and of the several States and the decisions of the courts of the United States and of the several States relating to the civil effects of convictions for offenses against the laws of the United States and of the several States; and that in addition to said usual number there be printed and bound in sheep 500 copies for the use of the Attorney-General; said digest to be printed under the editorial supervision of an editor or editors to be appointed by the Attorney-General, and the editing and clerical work incident thereto to be paid for out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on the direction of the Attorney-General, at a price not to exceed $2,500, which sum is hereby appropriated, and is to be in full payment for said work, except the cost of printing and binding the same.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. In May or June last this House authorized a reprint of the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry—I think upon the diseases of the horse, and also upon diseases of cattle. That was eight or ten months ago. I wish to ask the gentleman why that report has not yet been furnished?

Mr. HEATWOLE. The resolution for the printing passed the House and the Senate and was approved by the President in June last, but on account of the great prevalence of diseases among cattle and horses the employees in that division of the Agricultural Department have not been able to bring the book up to date, as provided for in the resolution, but it will be printed as soon as the Agricultural Department can bring it up to date.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is true, then, that the "copy" has not yet been furnished to the Printer?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I understand it has not.

Mr. LANDIS. And will not be furnished until a condition of convalescence obtains among horses and cattle! [Laughter.]

Mr. HEATWOLE. I know nothing about that. It has been ordered printed and will be printed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is the question one of convalescence among horses and cattle or of convalescence in the Bureau of Animal Industry? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEATWOLE. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has the same privilege of addressing the Department of Agriculture on this subject as we have. The matter has passed out of the province of the committee. Any member of the House can press the matter as well as the committee.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND DEBATES RELATING TO TRUSTS.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I also call up a concurrent resolution of the Senate, No. 50, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 1,600 copies of the compilation recently prepared by direction of the Attorney-General entitled Bills and Debates in Congress relating to Trusts, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 100 copies for the use of the Department of Justice; and that the Attorney-General shall cause an index to be prepared to said volume, compensation therefor not to exceed $500.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I reserve the point of order that this resolution is not priveleged. I should like to know what the resolution provides.

Mr. HEATWOLE. The adoption of this resolution is asked for by the Department of Justice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What does it provide for? I could not understand it as read.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I ask that the resolution be read again. It explains itself.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is clearly not within the rule as privileged. I do not know that I care very much about the matter, but I think it should be submitted by unanimous consent. Therefore I make the point that the resolution is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HEATWOLE] asks to submit the resolution by unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. I want to reserve an objection until I learn a little more about what the resolution is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] reserves a point of order.

Mr. HEATWOLE. This resolution explains itself. It is merely a compilation of all the laws and debates of Congress in regard to trusts.

Mr. CANNON. Let me see whether I understand the matter. As I understand, it is this: The various bills that have been introduced and not passed; the various amendments that have been proposed and not adopted; the various speeches that have been made and are entombed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—this is a proposition to cull them all out and get them together and put them in one volume, or perhaps a dozen volumes, and index them; and later on probably to pay somebody $5,000 or $10,000 for having made the compilation. That always follows as a matter of course. And then, if I am correct about it, when all this is done the whole thing is to be damned into oblivion. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that this is a collection of any old junk, but it is something that is asked for by the Department of Justice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think this matter ought to be passed at this time, and I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Alabama.

COMPILATION OF LAWS RELATING TO TRUSTS.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I also call up the following, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be prepared forthwith, under the direction of the Attorney-General, a compilation of all the laws enacted by the various States of the Union relating to trusts, or to combinations in restraint of trade and commerce, of which compilation 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 5,000 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 500 for the use of the Department of Justice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not privileged.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio reserves the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the committee, if it is not a fact that in the second volume of the report of the Industrial Commission there is already printed every one of these statutes of the various States?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I do not think it is complete.

Mr. PARKER. And the second volume can not be obtained any more.

Mr. HEATWOLE. And besides, it is out of print.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, it did not get out any too speedily, did it? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEATWOLE. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not think this ought to be printed.

Mr. HEATWOLE. This is a matter which is asked for by the Department of Justice.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I also call up the following, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound together in paper 30,000 copies of the following documents, namely: "United States Bankrupt Law of 1898, uniform system, with marginal notes and index;" "General Orders and Forms in Bankruptcy, adopted and established by the Supreme Court of the United States, November 28, 1898," and "House bill (13679) for the amendment of the bankruptcy law, passed by the Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, on January 28, 1903," of which 10,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 20,000 copies for the use of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I do.

Mr. MANN. I call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the resolution to the fact that he proposes to print a House bill which has since been enacted into a law. It would be far better to print the law. The bill has come into the House as a conference report and is now a law and is in print as a law. It would be perfectly preposterous to print the bill in connection with the original bankruptcy act when we have a law amending the bankruptcy law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the object of this resolution, which I introduced, is quite plain. At the time the resolution was introduced the bill had not been signed by the President, and therefore it could not be called an act. Congress, in 1898, when it passed the bankruptcy law, provided for the publication of the bankruptcy law and for certain forms and rules of practice, to be prescribed by the Supreme Court, under a provision of the bankruptcy law. Now, we have amended that law. That amendment has become an act by reason of the signature of the President. It is very important that this be distributed, as much so as that the original law should be distributed.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman explain to us why we should print a bill which was pending but which has since been changed into a law?

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman's point. I stated to him that at the time I introduced this resolution it was still a bill.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BARTLETT. And if he will give me the number of the act it can be very readily amended in that way, and I will offer the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I will be glad to do so. It is Public Act No. 62.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what I intended to do, and supposed the committee would recommend the change.

Mr. MANN. I merely called the attention of the chairman to the fact that if it was to be printed it better be printed in the form of the law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I will move the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9 strike out the words and figures "House bill 13679," and insert the words "Public Law No. 62."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman if it would not be wise to further amend this resolution so as to provide that these volumes should be bound in sheep rather than in paper. In paper they will be worthless. If we are going to have them at all, let us have them in durable form, so that they will be of some value.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that instead of being bound in sheep they be bound in half morocco.

Mr. HEPBURN. No; that is too expensive.

Mr. HEATWOLE. It is not any more expensive than sheep, and is more durable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HEATWOLE. To be bound in half morocco.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 strike out the word "paper" and insert "half morocco."

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to suggest to the gentleman whether he had not better have the lawyers' names to whom these volumes are to be sent put on in gilt—stamped on each volume?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word about the resolution. First, I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] if he will have the kindness hereafter to blue print his humor. [Laughter.] I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HEATWOLE], whether this bankruptcy law is not printed, first bound in paper and then in calf, along with the other session laws?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I think the law is printed.

Mr. CANNON. It is printed the same as all other laws, and in the number that all other laws are printed. After all, is not that enough? The law-book publishers print it. It is printed by the Government—printed as a separate act—I do not know how many copies. My friend from Minnesota can tell me how many little pamphlet copies are printed of each law—the bankruptcy law or any other law.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I think each member gets 13 or 14 copies.

Mr. CANNON. Fourteen copies of every law that is passed come in the shape of a pamphlet.

Mr. HEATWOLE. A supplement.

Mr. CANNON. But they print them as separate pamphlets. How many of those?

Mr. MANN. They only print the usual number.

Mr. CANNON. How many?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Sixteen hundred and eighty-two is the usual number, and one for each member goes into the document room.

Mr. CANNON. But I am speaking of the acts. A bill passes to-day, and some time next week we can send to the document room and get a copy of it. How many of those is each member entitled to?

Mr. HEATWOLE. One or two.

Mr. CANNON. But I have got as high as half a dozen.

Mr. MANN. Then you got somebody else's copy.

Mr. CANNON. I never found any scarcity.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I wondered where all these things were going. [Laughter.] That is one reason why the Printing Committee have been so active.

Mr. CANNON. I have got as high as a dozen, and I never got a dozen of more than any one act, or any other number of any one act that was passed in any one Congress.

Mr. HEATWOLE. You got several that belonged to other districts.

Mr. CANNON. And I suppose other people got some that belonged to my district, of all the others except perhaps one that I had a constituent that had some special interest in knowing about it. What I want to say is this: Why should we single out this one act and print 30,000 copies of it, and not 30,000 copies of all of the rest of the public acts?

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. I want to say in answer to the gentleman that it is because there will be a hundred applications for this bill where there is one application for almost any other bill passed at this session.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I withdraw my amendment in regard to half morocco, and insist on the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his second amendment?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if it is not a fact that every lawyer in the United States who does business in bankruptcy now has in his office all of this publication except three or four pages of amendments that have recently become law?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I do not think so.

Mr. PAYNE. Then if they have not copies of this act and the rules of the referee, and so forth, they are not equipped to practice in the bankruptcy courts. They must have them.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I would ask to hear from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. JENKINS] on that point. He has insisted on this printing being done.

The SPEAKER. How much time is yielded?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Two or three minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. I did not hear the question of the gentleman.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I wish the gentleman from Wisconsin would answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. JENKINS. I did not hear the question.

Mr. PAYNE. I will ask the gentleman if it is not all printed and not already contained in this publication, except the three or four pages of amendments recently passed by this Congress?

Mr. JENKINS. I do not know; but I will say to the gentleman from New York that I am informed at the document room that they have had over 3,000 applications for this document that they can not supply, and I think it is but fair to this House to say that the Judiciary Committee have had at least 2,000 applications, and it is desired that the whole thing shall be complete.

Mr. PAYNE. Why do they not borrow money enough to buy a copy?

Mr. JENKINS. I can not answer that question. I know there is a great demand, and that it is one of the most valuable documents printed by the Government. If it is not printed, it is impossible to get it. It is not printed by the law publishers.

Mr. PAYNE. While I have had a number of applications for these amendments, I have not had an application from a lawyer in my district for the original bankruptcy law.

Mr. JENKINS. That may be the case in the gentleman's district, but the demand exists for them from all the different parts of this country.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

LAW OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT UNDER MILITARY OCCUPATION.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I offer the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 48.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the Reports on the Law of Civil Government under Military Occupation, submitted to the Secretary of War by Charles E. Magoon, law officer, Division of Insular Affairs, War Department, of which 1,400 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,800 for the House of Representatives, and 800 for the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I reserve the point of order that this is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. HEATWOLE. It was not offered as a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi object?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I made the point of order that it is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LESSLER. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order?

GAZETTEER OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 65.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed, and bound in cloth, 8,000 copies of are print of the Gazetteer of the Philippine Islands, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HEATWOLE. I do.

Mr. MANN. There is no provision in this resolution for printing the maps that are in this gazetteer. If the action of the House a few days ago upon the sundry civil bill should be made law the gazetteer would be printed without the maps being made a part of it if this resolution should pass.

Mr. HEATWOLE. It is all that is asked for by the insular division of the War Department now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is probably not aware that the House inserted a provision the other day in the sundry civil bill that no document ordered printed should contain maps or illustrations or anything except printed matter unless specifically authorized at the time the order for printing was made.

Mr. HEATWOLE. This provides for a reprint of the gazetteer.

Mr. MANN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if the provision which the House inserted in the sundry civil bill becomes law, the Public Printer is directed not to insert maps or illustrations in any matter ordered to be printed by the House unless a special order be made authorizing it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is only applied to the departments.

Mr. MANN. It expressly stated printing matter ordered by Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. HEATWOLE, a motion to reconsider the various votes by which the several resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I present the following from the Committee on Pensions, and ask its passage.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That authority is granted to print and bind for use of the Committee on Pensions all documents deemed necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-seventh Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of Senate bill 6486 and Report 3389, an act providing for the appropriate marking of the graves of soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy. There is a demand for them that can not be supplied.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise the point of order. Almost every morning the time of the House is taken up asking for the reprint of bills. Is it not in order to go to the committee from which the bill came and get an order from that committee for a reprint without taking up the time of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that that power would not belong to the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the rule, the committee has the right to order a reprint.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman went to the Committee on Printing he could get a reprint.

The SPEAKER. That would be the proper course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, but I think the gentleman should go to the Committee on Printing and not take up the time of the House when he can as well get it there.

The SPEAKER. This, however, is the usual course, the Chair will say to the gentleman. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, immediately after reading the Journal, the House shall proceed to consider the bill (H. R. 15520) to establish a standard of value and to provide for a coinage system for the Philippine Islands, with Senate amendments and with amendments reported by the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, asks unanimous consent that House bill 15520, with Senate amendments and amendments reported by the Committee on Insular Affairs, be set down for hearing on Tuesday next, immediately after the approval of the Journal. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes, and I ask that the report be read and the reading of the statement omitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana calls up the conference report on the Senate bill 3653, and asks that the statement be read and the reading of the report be omitted.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read and the reading of the statement be omitted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the report.

[For report see proceedings of the House, Thursday, February 19, 1903.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous agreement on the part of the conferees between the two Houses. Unless some gentleman desires special explanation, I shall not take the time of the House to discuss it, and I ask that the report be adopted.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do; I yield for a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman to say that all House conferees have agreed upon this substitute for both House and Senate bill, which has been printed in the RECORD and is now before the House.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand also that this substitute, offered by the conferees as a substitute for both House and Senate bills, strikes out this provision of the bill that passed the House, and was reported by the Judiciary Committee at the last session, April 4, 1902, these words "in the performance of his official duty" or "because of his official character" or "because of his official acts," etc.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Those words of limitation were omitted so far as they might relate to the attack on the President or Vice-President, or upon any person who may at the time be acting as President. The words of limitation are retained in other portions of the bill.

Now, just one word of explanation. This is not a substitute entirely on the part of the conferees. Members will recall that the parliamentary status of this legislation is about as follows: The Senate bill was passed and the House amended it by way of a substitute. The Senate disagreed to that amendment and a conference was agreed upon. Certain features of the House bill, almost entirely the House bill, were agreed upon by the conferees, but, for the purpose of convenience, instead of striking out certain lines and inserting words, the conferees determined to make one amendment, and that is why it appears as an entirely new bill. These features of the House bill relative to immigration, naturalization, and the teaching of the duty to kill or attack public officials, or for the advocacy of no government, are retained substantially as they appear in the House bill. The only material change in the House bill is the elimination from it of the words of limitation just stated by the gentleman from Georgia in attacks upon the President or Vice-President. These words of limitation are retained when attacks are made on those officers of the Government in line of succession to the Presidency.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman remembers the report made by Mr. Ray, then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which I take it for granted, not hearing any dissent from the gentleman from Indiana, that he agreed with the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, who made the report. And in that report the chairman of that committee, speaking for the majority at least of the committee—all except the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] and the gentleman then a member from Texas, Judge Lanham, these two gentlemen presenting minority views—stated that the Senate bill, which did not have these words of limitation on it when it came over from the Senate (as I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say the bill which comes here from the conference committee in lieu of both the Senate and the House bills has not) was obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States because it did not have that limitation upon it.

The gentleman from Indiana and the House will remember with what ability that proposition was argued upon the floor of the House by the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Ray, of New York, a gentleman who has demonstrated his ability as a lawyer in this House and elsewhere, and who has been promoted to a high judicial position upon the Federal bench by reason of such eminent ability. I should like to know whether the gentleman from Indiana has changed his views upon the legal proposition which was then presented in the report of the Judiciary Committee. The then chairman of the Judiciary, I repeat, in this report which I hold in my hand, and in a learned and exhaustive argument on the floor of the House, held that the legislation then sought by the Senate to be enacted in lieu of the House bill was unconstitutional. The gentleman from Indiana, as I understand, has changed his views upon that question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am ready to answer the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not indulging in any carping criticism at all. I simply want information.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to the fact that in the debate at the time referred to by the gentleman, the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Ray, stated that while it was his individual opinion that though the President was to be regarded as being always in the performance of his duty—ready as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to discharge such duty—yet, out of abundance of caution, and entertaining possibly some doubt but not conviction that there might be a time when he was not so engaged, agreed to those words of limitation. He at no time, as I understand, made a positive statement in the debate (although I am not disputing the fact as to the report) that there was some doubt about the necessity of the words of limitation as to the President. The gentleman will remember that in all legislation there is more or less of compromise; and the House conferees, in view of the fact that the Senate was in a disposition to entertain practically all of the House measure, except so far as these words of limitation in the first section are concerned, were of the unanimous opinion—the gentleman's colleague on the minority of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] agreeing with me—that perhaps it would be better to accept that amendment in view of our obtaining so large concessions for the remainder of the House bill.

Personally, at the time of the discussion within the committee, I took the position, as the gentleman will perhaps recall, that the words of limitation were not necessary; and hence, while I acceded to the majority report, I did not waive the conviction which I still entertain, that the measure is constitutional, even with the elimination of those words of limitation.

Mr. BARTLETT. I believe I recall that the gentleman did make that statement. But the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Ray, in his report and in his argument upon the floor of the House, did not intimate that there was any doubt as to the constitutionality of these provisions without this limitation; but in his report, referring to the first six sections of the Senate bill (which I hold in my hand), he declared that "the first six sections of the Senate bill are undoubtedly unconstitutional," and he went on to argue from the decisions of the Supreme Court, supported by citations of cases referred to in that report, to sustain that proposition, that the Senate bill was unconstitutional.

So that, whatever may have been the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana about the subject at the time, whatever is his opinion now, the Judiciary Committee at that time, represented by its able chairman in a report which he made, and represented on this floor by the able argument which he made in support of his position, were of the opinion that any bill (this happened to be called the Senate bill)—that any legislation which did not contain these limitations was unconstitutional.

Now, will the gentleman permit me one minute more to explain my position? I did not vote for the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary at that time; I am not prepared to vote for this substitute. But it occurs to me that after having passed our legislation on this subject in the early part of the first session of the present Congress, and our measure having come back to us from the Senate, and having been sent into conference, and coming from the conference committee after a lapse of nearly ten months, I believe that if we are to pass legislation on this subject, which we all know was demanded by the terrible tragedy enacted in this country in September, 1901, we ought to pass legislation which will stand the test of the courts.

If we are to transfer from the jurisdiction of the State courts the trial of these cases, whenever any such thing shall occur again, if we are to transfer such cases to the jurisdiction solely of the Federal courts, then, when we take such cases away from the State jurisdiction, where trial and punishment have always been and will continue to be speedy and certain, we ought not at least to enact a law which this House by its vote has once declared unconstitutional—"undoubtedly" so, in the language of the former chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House.

I shall not vote for this substitute, as I did not vote for the original bill. I am less inclined to vote for the substitute than I was for that bill, because in my judgment, having investigated the question somewhat at the time when the bill was formerly before the House, having made some remarks upon it in the line of my present position, I am still convinced, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court, that under our Constitution Congress has not the right or power to enact simply that it shall be a crime to assault the President or the Vice-President or any other Federal officer when he is not in fact in the discharge of his official duties, and give the courts of the United States exclusive jurisdiction of such offenses regardless of the place where such offenses are committed.

While we were all anxious to throw around the President of the United States proper protection from assault or violence, I felt to accept this substitute reported by the conferees would be a useless and fruitless thing, when it shall ever occur again, which God forbid, that the President of the United States is assaulted or slain. The Federal courts have no jurisdiction of that offense, because we have not limited it in the way, in my judgment, the Constitution of the United States requires it shall be limited, and for these reasons I shall not vote for the substitute and shall vote against the conference report. I thank the gentleman for the courtesy he has extended.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WAR CLAIMS, OMNIBUS RESOLUTION.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, on the 16th of January the War Claims Committee had the floor and recommended the passage of a few small bills and among them a resolution referring some cases to the Court of Claims. All were passed with the exception of the resolution, and on a call of the yeas and nays a quorum did not develop, but the vote showed that nearly two-thirds present voted in favor of the passage of the resolution. In order to save the time of the House, I move that the vote ordering the yeas and nays be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. That would have to be by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAHON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that vote may be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the order by which the yeas and nays were ordered upon a resolution reported, numbered 362, referring a certain number of matters to the Court of Claims, be vacated. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAHON. I now move that the resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending that I want to ask a question. I do not want to amend the bill, but by inadvertence or clerical error the name of John T. Lawrence, deceased——

Mr. MAHON. It is in the original bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It was in the original bill and has been left out through a purely clerical error.

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope it will be inserted. I have submitted the matter to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OTJEN] who reported it, and also to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I rise simply to have that inserted.

Mr. MAHON. I have no objection to the correction.

The SPEAKER. If it was in the original bill it is entitled to come in now, and that understanding will be had if there is no objection. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MAHON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The resolution above referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That the bills (H. R. 6511, H. R. 9380, H. R. 10014, H. R. 5042, H. R. 8262, H. R. 9479, H. R. 5717, H. R. 5720, H. R. 10129, H. R. 10128, H. R. 10081, H. R. 1764, H. R. 2211, H. FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. PADGETT rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PADGETT. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PADGETT. I rise to inquire if it will now be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider claims upon the Private Calendar of the Committee on War Claims, this being Friday and the day set apart for the business of that committee.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be proper unless one of higher order comes in, and the Chair has just recognized the gentleman from Indiana to call up the fortification bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 17046) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PADGETT. Is that a privileged motion over the regular business set apart for this day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is, undoubtedly.

Mr. PADGETT. Another parliamentary inquiry. If this be voted down by the House, will it then be in order to make the motion to which I referred?

The SPEAKER. That will undoubtedly be in order. It may be in order to renew that, or make any other motion which is in order.

Mr. PADGETT. Then I hope the House will vote down the motion of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PADGETT) there were—ayes 71, noes 42.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17046, the fortifications appropriation bill, with Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota in the chair.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, the report of the committee is so clear that I ask that the Clerk read it in my time in explanation of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the accompanying bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates on which the bill is based will be found in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1904, pages 246–253, and aggregate $15,004,420, of which sum there is recommended in the accompanying bill appropriations amounting to $7,093,943, which sum is $205,012 less than was appropriated in the last fortification act.

During the Forty-ninth Congress (fiscal years 1887 and 1888) no appropriations were made on account of fortifications, their maintenance and armament, and for the twelve fiscal years 1875 to 1886, inclusive, the appropriation by Congress on this account averaged only $540,750 per annum, and only $463,500 per annum for the fourteen years including 1887 and 1888, for which latter two fiscal years no specific appropriations were made, as stated.

The bill reported herewith contains appropriations in continuance of the policy adopted by the Fiftieth Congress in the passage of the acts approved September 22, 1888, and March 2, 1889, and by the Fifty-first, Fifty-second, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses in acts approved August 18, 1890, February 24, 1891, July 23, 1892, February 18, 1893, August 1, 1894, March 2, 1895, June 6, 1896, March 3, 1897, May 7, 1898, March 3, 1899, May 25, 1900, March 1, 1901, and June 6, 1902.

The appropriations by said acts for the fifteen fiscal years 1889-1903 aggregate $75,718,243.50, or an average of $5,047,882.90 per annum.

Of the whole sum, $75,718,243.50, appropriated by the fortification acts covering the fifteen fiscal years 1889–1903, the sum of $45,845,391 was appropriated in the seven fortification acts enacted by the present and the last three Congresses.

The fortification appropriation acts enacted during the Fifty-fifth Congress appropriated $14,287,396, in addition to which amount sums aggregating $8,674,898 were provided in deficiency appropriation acts for fortifications and the armament thereof, and the further sum of $12,865,840.60 was allotted for the same objects from the general appropriation of $50,000,000 made for the national defense in the act of March 9, 1898, making in all $35,828,134.60 available for fortifications and the armament thereof under appropriations made during the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The total appropriations made for fortifications and other works of defense since 1888 and since the recommendations of the Endicott board of 1885, including the appropriations made in deficiency acts and allotments made from the national-defense fund, amount to $96,752,982.

The scheme of seacoast fortifications contemplated by the Endicott board, and which has been followed by Congress in the appropriations made since 1888, it is now estimated will cost in the aggregate $99,392,222, of which sum there has been already provided $57,508,983, the Engineer Department having received $25,757,164 and the Ordnance Department $31,608,586.

The difference between the sum, $57,508,983 already provided toward the scheme of the Endicott board and the sum total of appropriations, $96,752,982, for fortifications since 1888 is represented in expenditures for erecting and equipping the gun factory at Watervliet, the gun-carriage factory at Watertown, the Ordnance and Fortification Board, purchase of land for fortification sites, torpedoes for harbor defense, providing ammunition for service and for tests, manufacture of field guns, and for sundry other objects incident to providing and maintaining a system of seacoast defenses.

The following shows the aggregate amount appropriated under each natural subdivision of the accompanying bill, namely:

Gun and mortar batteries	$2,236,425
Searchlights for defenses in important harbors	223,500
Sites for fortifications	200,000
Installation of range and position finders	150,000
Preservation and repair of fortifications	300,000
Plans for fortifications	5,000
Tools, etc., for maintaining and operating electric plants	35,000
Sea walls and embankments	89,575
Construction of mining casemates, etc	50,000
Purchase of submarine mines, etc	100,000
Torpedo depot at Fort Totten	3,000
Armament of fortifications	3,480,500
Proving ground, Sandy Hook, N. J	77,943
Frankford Arsenal, Pa	43,000
Ordnance and Fortification Board	100,000
Total	7,093,943

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, unless some gentleman wants to propound a question to me, I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following as a new section:

"To the heirs of Dr. Hiram P. Tuttle, as compensation for his labors in the invention and perfection of the high explosive thorite, which high explosive was used by the United States Government, the sum of $25,000: Provided, however, That all formulæ, data, and facts relating to the process, necessary to the successful manufacture of said thorite, shall be placed in the possession of the Secretary of War; and the said heirs of Dr. Hiram P. Tuttle shall by proper instrument convey to the United States the right to manufacture and use said high explosive thorite before said $25,000 payment shall be made to them. The said sum of $25,000 for said purpose is directed to be taken from the appropriation of $100,000 made by act of Congress making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, approved March 1, 1901, for the purpose of securing the high explosive thorite and the Isham high explosive shell."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I will ask the gentleman if he will provide in his amendment that this shall be in full for all claims of Dr. Tuttle's heirs.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, and suggest the insertion in the amendment which I have already offered, near the close of the amendment, after the phrase "that the said sum of $25,000 for said purpose," insert the words "shall be in full for all claims of the heirs of the said Dr. Hiram P. Tuttle."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Let us hear the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the last paragraph of the amendment so that it will read: "The said sum of $25,000 for said purpose shall be in full for all claims of the heirs of the said Dr. Hiram P. Tuttle."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, a point of order was reserved to the whole amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, in the beginning of this discussion I would say this is practically the same amendment which I offered a year ago and which the committee at that time did me the honor to adopt. But when my amendment, adopted a year ago in this House, reached the Senate that item was dropped from the bill. This condition of affairs is my excuse for again pressing upon the attention of this body a matter upon which they once favorably passed.

The facts in relation to this matter I wish to recite very briefly. Dr. Tuttle resided for many years in Tacoma, in the State of Washington, which city is my home. I knew him intimately for twelve years, he being my family physician, and he was one of the best and brightest men it has ever been my privilege to know.

Dr. Tuttle was the inventor of what is known as "thorite," which was proved, under actual test by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification of the United States, to be one of the greatest high explosives known to man. After the Doctor brought his explosive to the attention of the officials of this Government some objections were made to certain qualities and characteristics of his explosive. Dr. Tuttle labored for a number of years largely under the supervision of the War Department and the Ordnance Department of this Government to bring this explosive to the point of perfection. That he did bring this explosive to the point of perfection is attested by the fact that the Board of Ordnance and Fortification adopted the following resolution in relation thereto:

As "thorite" is the safest and most effective high explosive that has been presented to and tested under the direction of this board, it is the opinion of the board that Dr. Tuttle is entitled to a reasonable compensation for his invention, and it is recommended that he be so compensated.

As a further evidence of the fact that this explosive was considered a success I may state that the records of the War Department show that they had Dr. Tuttle in his lifetime manufacture for the Government 7,000 pounds of this explosive, part of which they sent to the Philippine Islands. I state these facts to show that this amendment offered here by me to-day is not an effort to have the Government pay a doubtful debt or for a worthless compound, but, on the contrary, if this amendment is adopted it will be a late recognition on the part of the Government for an invention the benefit of which we have long had the use of.

There is no disposition on my part to press this claim here to-day on sympathetic grounds, but I may be pardoned for mentioning in passing—for the Doctor was my friend in his lifetime—that after he spent years of labor to bring this invention to perfection he had the bitter misfortune to see others reap the rewards of his labor. He died, as I believe, under the effects of his disappointment. This phase of the matter I will not go into further for fear I might say something that were better left unsaid.

The Secretary of War recommended during the lifetime of Dr. Tuttle that he be compensated for his labors. Let me read to you what the Secretary of War said in his official letter on this subject:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 15, 1902.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry in regard to the action taken under the clause of the fortifications act of March 1, 1901, regarding the Isham high-explosive shell and the high-explosive "thorite," I have to say that after the passage of the act which provided for the purchase of those inventions by the Secretary of War, "in his discretion and if in his judgment it will be for the best interests of the Government," I asked the advice of both the Ordnance Department and the Board of Ordnance and Fortification to aid me in forming a judgment as to whether the purchase would be for the best interests of the Government.

The Ordnance Department advised against the purchase as to both. The Board of Ordnance and Fortification advised against the purchase of the Isham shell by a vote of 4 to 2, and divided equally—3 to 3—upon the purchase of thorite. Under these circumstances I have not considered myself justified in making the purchase of either.

The Board of Ordnance and Fortification also adopted the following resolution:

"As thorite is the safest and most effective high explosive that has been presented to and tested under the direction of this board, it is the opinion of the board that Dr. Tuttle is entitled to a reasonable compensation for his invention, and it is recommended that he be so compensated."

This recommendation was approved by me, with the following annotation: "This is understood to relate not to any power of the Secretary of War, but to an appeal to powers resting in Congress alone."

I did not feel at liberty to purchase the invention under the act of March 1, 1901, because I considered myself bound to act upon a strictly business basis, giving effect to no consideration except the business interests of the United States in executing that statute.

I approved the recommendation for compensation to Dr. Tuttle, because I think his long and faithful labors, in conjunction with many officers of the United States, in seeking to develop a practical high explosive merited reward and were probably of material use in the development of the art to which they related; and I think that a just exercise of the powers which Congress possesses, but the Secretary of War does not possess, should lead to a grant of reasonable and even liberal compensation to Dr. Tuttle's heirs.

The Board of Ordnance and Fortification, since its action above mentioned, has recommended a further test of the Isham shell, and that recommendation has been approved.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. J. A. HEMENWAY,
House of Representatives.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Now let me ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that all the rights that Dr. Tuttle had in this explosive which he is said to have discovered were transferred to the people who now own the Isham shell and "thorite?"

Mr. CUSHMAN. No; that is not correct.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Were not their rights pooled in some way?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will explain to the gentleman from Ohio when and to what extent the inventor of "thorite" and the inventor of the Isham shell pooled their rights and interests. At the time this matter was first presented to the War Department Dr. Tuttle was pressing his high explosive, "thorite," and it was conceded by the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications to be the best high explosive then known to man. At the same time Mr. Isham presented his invention in the form of a high-explosive shell, a chambered shell having several compartments therein, that mechanism being designed to lessen the jar upon the explosive contained therein. Now, then, permit me to say right here that I know nothing about the Isham shell only in a general way. I am not pretending to-day to discuss its merits or demerits. I only mention it as its connection with "thorite" has come up in this discussion. There are two boards connected with the War Department who, as I understand it, pass upon the merits of ordnance and explosives. The Board of Ordnance and Fortification, with General Miles at the head of it, strongly recommended Dr. Tuttle's explosive, "thorite." The other board, what is the name of it——

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. The Ordnance Board.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes; the Ordnance Board was the other board. And it seems at this time of which I am speaking, when Dr. Tuttle was showing to this board his high explosive, "thorite," they would say to Dr. Tuttle: "We don't need your high explosive, 'thorite,' because we can take Mr. Isham's high-explosive shell."

Then when Mr. Isham presented to this same board his chambered shell they would say to him: "We don't need to purchase your chambered shell, because we can get Dr. Tuttle's high explosive, 'thorite.'" [Laughter.]

Therefore the owners of these two inventions conceived—whether they were right or not I do not pretend to say—that this board was playing one off against the other. They made, I think, some kind of an agreement to at that time present their two inventions to the War Department together and not separately. This they did. That was two years and more ago. What was the result? This House voted $100,000 for the absolute purchase of these two inventions. That was in the fortification bill of two years ago that passed this House.

Now, then, when that bill went from this House to the Senate the Senate amended that provision of the bill, and instead of leaving an absolute provision for the purchase of these two inventions for $100,000, they made an appropriation of $100,000 for these two inventions, but left the purchase of them entirely in the option of the Secretary of War. That $100,000 is still available, because the Secretary of War has refused to exercise his option and make the purchase. Now let me go further; why has the Secretary of War refused to make this purchase? My judgment is that it was because he was not entirely satisfied with the Isham shell. These two inventions were tied together at that time by the terms of that appropriation act. He could not buy one without buying the other. He did not feel justified in purchasing both. Now, then, I have read into the RECORD in connection with my remarks to-day the letter of the Secretary of War in which he speaks in flattering terms of the work done by the inventor of "thorite." The Secretary of War says that in his judgment Congress should give to the inventor of "thorite" a reasonable compensation. That is exactly what my amendment provides.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not consider that it is necessary for me to continue the discussion of this matter to any great length, but simply to state briefly what has heretofore been done in this connection. I believe that the mere recital of the record will be all that is necessary. This House twice before this has placed the stamp of its approval on practically the same proposition which I am offering to-day. The first time was two years ago when this House voted $100,000 for the purchase of Tuttle's "thorite" and Isham's shell.

As I said, when the matter went over to the Senate, the Senate changed that provision by inserting a clause leaving the purchase within the discretion of the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War refused to exercise that discretion because, as I believe, he was not satisfied with the Isham shell, and not that he was not satisfied with the other provision relating to Dr. Tuttle's thorite. The two were inseparable, and he could not take one without taking the other, and therefore he refused to take either.

And yet, after that time, a year ago, this House, upon my motion, adopted an amendment to this same bill appropriating $50,000 for the purchase of Dr. Tuttle's thorite. We passed that by practically a unanimous vote. When it went over to the Senate, the Senate committee refused to accede to it and it went out. Therefore I have presented to-day, as an amendment to this bill, a provision to pay the heirs of Dr. Tuttle $25,000 for the invention and perfection of what was said to be the best high explosive that was then known to man; a high explosive of which the War Department manufactured a thousand pounds and sent to the Philippine Islands; a high explosive that was used on the walls of Pekin; a high explosive which the Secretary of War says merits a payment to the inventor of liberal compensation.

In closing let me say that the present owners of "thorite" are the widow and the children of Dr. Tuttle, who reside in the city of Tacoma, Wash. They will receive the benefit of our action to-day, and I consider it will be but part compensation and a tardy reward. You will observe that my amendment to-day has only been offered for $25,000, one-half of the amount that this House voted on this same proposition a year ago. My reason for reducing the amount one-half was in the hope that the Senate might accede to this matter.

The House has twice voted in favor of this proposition, and I certainly think the same should be adopted to-day. I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word. It is a matter that has been disputed whether Dr. Tuttle was entitled to any large amount of credit, and therefore to any large compensation, on account of his relations to the discovery of the explosive called thorite. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the merits of that controversy to express an opinion here upon the amendment that has just been offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN]. I do know that the War Department has made careful tests of what is known as the Isham shell, which sustains, in the imagination of my friend from Washington, such an important relation to thorite, and the result of the experiment was that the Isham shell had an explosive capacity sufficient to burst any gun in which it was properly fired, and therefore is now out of the run, and entirely unsuited for the purpose for which it was claimed to be adapted.

Thorite has marked a distinct step in the development of explosives. It is now obsolete. It has been displaced, if it ever had a permanent place, in the armament of this country.

But I only rose, Mr. Chairman, to say one word upon another phase of this subject, if I can have order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. Gentlemen in the aisles will take their seats.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Not that I am so anxious that others should hear me as that I shall be able to hear myself. [Laughter.] A year ago I took occasion, when this bill was under discussion, to refer to the charge that had been made against the Ordnance Department, that it was behind the times; that it was suffering from barnacles who are opposing the progress of events, and established the fact by the records of Congress and the War Department that the Ordnance Department had always been right whenever a conflict arose between it and Congress as to whether experiments should be made with certain projectiles, weapons, and explosives.

I only rise now for the purpose of supplementing that very full statement, complete up to that time, with a reference to two recent achievements of the War Department as illustrating that fact and demonstrating certain things that they have contended for: First, the Isham shell was unfit for the purpose of modern warfare, and second, that they could build, what has been thought to be impracticable and not useful from a practical standpoint in military affairs, a great 16-inch gun, built upon scientific and mechanical principles, that have justified their theoretical design, with the result that they have been able to fire a projectile weighing about 2,400 pounds, with an explosive which the Army itself has discovered and put into practical operation, with such accuracy as that the projectile itself went through the air with the exact speed that had been estimated by the Ordnance Department, and with the exact pressure on the interior of the gun which had been scientifically estimated before the firing occurred; and had exhibited to all the world, what had never been established as practical, that a great 16-inch gun could be manufactured at a reasonable figure and could become a useful part in coast fortifications.

The history of this gun is, in brief, as follows:

The board known as the "Endicott board," created by act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, for the purpose of devising a system for the coast defenses of the United States, included in its scheme of defense forty-four 16-inch guns. The Ordnance Department at once proceeded to draw up a design for the armament called for in this report; and although later the 16-inch gun was, for the time being, eliminated from the scheme of defense, largely owing to the cost of its turret emplacement, the Ordnance Department considered it advisable to build one such gun in order that the knowledge gained by such construction work might be at hand should guns of such enormous power be subsequently desired. The act of Congress of May 25, 1900, appropriated $60,000 for the purpose of testing this type gun. In the summer of 1902 this gun was completed, and received its official test in January of 1903, the delay being caused by the difficulty of securing transportation for this enormous mass (130 tons) from the Army Gun Factory at Watervliet Arsenal to the Sandy Hook proving ground. This gun was designed to fire a projectile weighing 2,400 pounds with a velocity of 2,300 feet per second and a pressure not exceeding 38,000 pounds per square inch. The Ordnance Department was called upon to procure a powder suitable for this gun, and it is gratifying to note that although there existed no gun of sufficient power to serve as a comparison in designing the grain of this powder, the first sample tested gave a velocity of 2,307 feet, with a pressure of about 37,500 pounds.

A brief account of the recent history of the Isham shell is as follows:

Under date of March 21, 1899, the Board of Ordnance and Fortification recommended that the Chief of Ordnance procure ten 12-inch shells of Mr. Isham's design and two 12-inch steel plates, together with a sufficient quantity of explosive gelatine to load the ten shells; this with a view to testing the Isham diaphragm shell throwing high explosives. This having been approved by the Secretary of War, the Chief of Ordnance directed the purchase of the material desired by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, and directed the tests to be made by the ordnance board at the Sandy Hook proving ground. The results of these tests are contained in the report of this latter board dated December 16, 1899.

In view of the recent destruction of a 12-inch rifle in the test of this shell, the third and fifth paragraphs in the conclusion of the board are worthy of note. These are as follows:

"3. That the Isham system is attended with danger not only on account of the sensitive nature of the high explosive which it is intended to use, but on account of the inherent weakness of the projectile itself. * * *

"5. In conclusion, the ordnance board is of the opinon that the Isham projectile is not best adapted to the ends sought and fills no present or prospective necessity for the service."

During the years 1900 and 1901 no tests were made with the Isham projectile, although on March 1, 1901, there was appropriated $100,000 to enable the Secretary of War, in his discretion, etc., to purchase the Isham shell and Tuttle thorite. In November the Board of Ordnance and Fortification decided to make further tests of these shells, and requested that five Isham torpedo shells be procured for test and fired from a 12-inch service rifle with varying pressures from 38,000 to 50,000 pounds per square inch, one of these shells to be first weighted with sand and without explosive charge. The final test of these projectiles with explosive charge was delayed by the preliminary tests of this sand-ballasted shell. On January 22, 1903, two Isham shells were fired from the 12-inch service rifle, the first with a charge of 500 pounds of brown prismatic powder, giving a pressure of about 42,000 pounds per square inch. The second projectile was fired with a charge of 530 pounds of powder and burst the gun explosively. The violence of the explosion can be judged from the fact that fragments of the heavy gun were found as much as 1,000 feet from the point of explosion. The bursted gun was worth $45,000, and the cost of the test was $16,721.86. The report of the Ordnance Board forwarding the records of firing of these two shells contains no comment, the matter being properly in the hands of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. The final action of this board has not been promulgated.

I am glad to add at this point a portion of an editorial appearing in the Army and Navy Journal of January 24, 1903:

TRIUMPH OF THE 16-INCH GUN.

The successful trial of the 16-inch rifle at Sandy Hook on Saturday, January 17, has converted into advocates for such ordnance many in and out of the Ordnance Corps who were, at least, doubtful as to the expediency of building guns of this caliber. The big gun not only realized the most sanguine expectations concerning it, but it furnished a complete vindication of the accuracy of the advance calculations of Col. J. M. Ingalls, United States Army, retired, as to what it would accomplish, which had been called in question by foreign experts. The greatest elevation of the gun on the proof carriage is 4 degrees. Taking the initial velocity of the 2,400-pound shot at 2,300 foot-seconds, the computation by Ingalls's formula gave a theoretical range at this elevation of 6,387 yards. In the trial of the gun observations from the base-end stations showed an actual range of 6,350 yards, or within 37 yards of the computed range—a difference of less than six-tenths of 1 per cent. Ingalls computed the extreme range, with the same weight of shot and the same initial velocity, at 20.9 miles.

Allowing the same per cent of difference and the actual maximum range should be 20.691 miles, or one-half of the distance between Washington and Annapolis. The artillery will be delighted to find Ingall's formulas so reliable. Foreign ballistic experts claimed that his calculations were some miles in excess of the possibilities of the gun.

When the 16-inch gun was fired with an elevation of 1° 25′, it ranged 2,500 yards. The loss in velocity of the 16-inch projectiles for the first 450 feet was not over 17 feet, or about 4 per cent of the velocity over the same initial space of 450 feet. This is due to a fact which should be emphasized in this connection—this is, that sectional density, or ratio of weight of projectile to area of cross section, increases with the caliber. Comparing the sectional densities of the 12-inch and the 16-inch projectile, both of the same form, we find that they stand in the ratio of 8 to 12 in favor of the 16-inch. The maximum ordinate of the 16-inch projectile for a range of 1½ miles may be rightly stated at 90 feet. The danger space for a battle ship includes this entire distance of 1½ miles from the muzzle and over the arc of a circle traversed by the gun.

There is a great gain in effectiveness over the 12-inch gun, and the Chief of Ordnance, General Crozier, is quite correct when he states that the succesful performance of the 16-inch gun at Sandy Hook, if it does not lead to the manufacture of more guns of like caliber, will at least result in the building of a gun of caliber intermediate between the 16-inch and the 12-inch, or, say, 14 or 15 inches. This intermediate gun will probably be the next in order. All artillerists know what flat trajections signify and the value of the recorded performance of the new gun.

We heartily congratulate Colonel Farley—we hope by the time this article is read, General Farley—on the triumphant conclusion of the great task he has had at Watervliet in completing this gun. It will be a monument to him and to all who have had any part in the conception, progress, and completion of the work now so happily brought to a conclusion. General Crozier is quoted as saying at the conclusion of the trial at Sandy Hook:

"The tests that have been made to-day have demonstrated that if guns like this are ever needed by this country they can be turned out successfully here. When a gun has handled the largest charge of smokeless powder ever put into a gun as this one has, it is safe to say that it is an absolute success. Everything has worked to our satisfaction. There was a lot of trouble making this gun, and there were many ways in which it might have been a failure. The breech might have blown out or become jammed, but, thank goodness, nothing did happen, and the tests have been a success. Of course there is a lot of work to be done yet. The bore must be measured with a star gauge to see if the tremendous explosion has caused any permanent expansion. If there is any expansion beyond a few hundredths of an inch, it would mean the failure of the gun. This gun is something new in ordnance, and after to-day I can safely say that it has come to stay. These tests show one thing, and that is that this gun can be fired with accuracy so as to hit an enemy's vessel at from 5 to 7 miles and can get an extreme range of as far as 20 miles, which is much greater than any gun has ever attained."

During the year 1902 the following material in service was recommended by the Ordnance Department, but was not invented by ordnance officers: The Ehrhardt eccentric breech block; the Gerdom breech mechanism for field guns; the Ehrhardt fuze; the Warner & Swasey telescopic sight; the Warner & Swasey range finder (favorably reported by a board of artillery officers). I do not doubt that the future history of the Ordnance Department will show it to be in the same manner efficient and considerate of the outside inventor.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order so that any member of the House might insist upon it, if he so desired. For myself I do not feel like insisting on the point of order. I have gone over the history of thorites; and the gentleman from Washington has read the recommendation of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. I have great confidence in that board. It is a board to which we submit all these propositions.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think this is subject to a point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is an open question, and a very close question.

Mr. BARTLETT. If it is a "very close question," and a doubtful question, whether this provision is in order on this bill, and the gentleman having made the point of order, it strikes me that the proposition ought to be one extremely meritorious, very overpowering and strenuous, to break down the rule which has been adopted for the safety of legislation on these bills.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I felt it my duty to reserve the point of order so that any member of this House might insist upon it if he felt so disposed.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has not yet withdrawn it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have not. Any member can insist upon the point when I get through with my statement, if he so desires.

Dr. Tuttle discovered this explosive—thorite. At the time it was discovered it was conceded by the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications to be the best high explosive that we had. Later on something better was developed. Dr. Tuttle died. This House passed an item on this appropriation bill providing for the payment of $100,000 for this explosive and for the Isham shell, in the discretion of the Secretary of War. The Secretary did not think it advisable to buy it; and I agree that he was right, because in the meantime there had been further discoveries—a better explosive than thorite was discovered. But the Secretary of War, believing that the discovery of thorite led to the discovery of the better explosive, thought that Dr. Tuttle ought to have some compensation, and he so states in his letter.

Now, it is proposed by this amendment to settle the controversy and to pay $25,000 out of the $100,000 heretofore appropriated in full for all claims against the Government in connection with this matter. Now, it is a question for the House to determine whether or not that ought to be done—whether or not at this time we ought to make this appropriation of $25,000 and settle this controversy upon payment of that amount. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the ordinary course of legislation, as I understand, this is a claim against the Government; is it not?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, it is such a claim as has usually been settled upon this bill. All claims for such inventions have been settled in this way. We know that years ago it was claimed by civilians that when they had made a valuable invention or discovery, and went with it to the Ordnance Department, they had no chance; that the civilian was always turned down and the Army officer favored. Growing out of that, this Board of Ordnance and Fortification was provided for, composed of the General of the Army, an ordnance officer, military officers, and one civilian, who represents and stands for the rights of civilians coming before the board with inventions or discoveries.

All such questions as this are submitted to that board, and their judgment taken; and it has been the rule to allow on this bill such compensation as this board may have determined upon for these inventions or discoveries. I think that, while there may have been exceptions, this item properly belongs here, though possibly it is subject to a point of order. I do not want to determine that question. The Chair will have to determine it if the point should be insisted upon. But being in charge of this bill, I thought it due to the House that I should reserve the point of order so that any member, after hearing the explanation of the gentleman from Washington and such other gentlemen as have been heard, might insist on the point of order if it was deemed proper. So far as I am concerned, I do not know that I care to make it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is renewed. Does the gentleman from Washington wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am perhaps not the greatest parliamentary expert in this body. [Laughter.] I regret exceedingly that a point of order has been raised upon my amendment. That regret is all the more keen because I fear that under the rules my amendment is subject to a point of order. However, I call attention in passing to the statement made by the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. HEMENWAY], that appropriations for types of ordnance and explosives are usually and ordinarily upon this bill—the fortification bill. Therefore a claim for compensation growing out of a matter of that character should certainly, as a matter of common sense, be presented by way of amendment to this bill, because the men in charge of this bill are the men who have the knowledge of the subject under discussion.

My amendment simply seeks to make an appropriation in line with other appropriations of a similar character that have been made on this same bill in times gone by. I trust I have made this matter perfectly clear to the Chair that this point of order can not be sustained. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BARTLETT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the Chair to sustain the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained the point of order on the ground that this is not an appropriation for carrying on the expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the Committee of the Whole rise and report the bill with a recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HEPBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17046) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment and with the recommendation that it pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the conferees only be read and that the reading of the report be omitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the statement only be read and that the reading of the report be omitted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the conferees.

[For statement and conference report see page 2358.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, unless there are some questions which gentlemen desire to ask, or unless some one desires to discuss the report, I move its adoption.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEMENWAY. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MAHON. I would like about five minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I simply rise to make a statement in reference to the business set apart for this day. This is war-claims day. On the Private Calendar there are 30 bills. They are all House bills. It would be a waste of time to attempt to pass these House bills, for they would never get through the Senate before the session closes. I insisted on passing the joint resolution and informed the parties who had opposed it that if they would allow this joint resolution to go through, which disposes of some 38 bills on the Private Calendar which, together with the 25 already passed, make over 100 bills, as chairman of that committee, I was satisfied. Now, I hope that there will be no effort made to go into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of consideration of these bills on the Private Calendar. If that is done, I shall insist on the bills being taken up in their regular order. They are House bills, and they will never be passed by the Senate, and I ask the gentlemen who are largely interested in these war claims not to insist on that motion. I think the Speaker and the House have been eminently fair in recognizing me this morning to pass this resolution. We have all that we ought to have and should make no complaint. We can not pass everything.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, under the rules one Friday in every month is set apart for the consideration of war claims.

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. During the session that day has been systematically, almost, taken away from the consideration of war claims and something else substituted. This is the day set apart for this war-claims business. Why should we not do the business which is set apart for this day?

Mr. MAHON. We did.

Mr. PADGETT. We did not so far. We were entitled to all of to-day to consider our claims and then take our chances of getting them through the Senate. By what authority does the gentleman say that we can not pass the bills in the Senate?

Mr. MAHON. In reply to the gentleman I will say that the Committee on War Claims is unanimous in its opposition to the balance of this day being consumed in the consideration of war claims. This House permitted 88 bills to go through this morning. They were on the Calendar. We were permitted to pass them in a few minutes. Now, you could have spent a whole week of the time of this House and could not have passed those bills one at a time.

Mr. PADGETT. The House passed that resolution in committee and the time was consumed a month ago, and under the order of procedure of business it would not have required this morning over ten minutes to pass that bill. Now, why should we not go ahead with the business that was given to us this day under the rules?

Mr. MAHON. Because this House by unanimous consent or by rule adopted gives the Committee on Banking and Currency the right of way, as the gentleman will see if he looks at his order of business.

Mr. PADGETT. The rule does not give it right of way. It allows it to be called up by the committee.

Mr. MAHON. Yes; any time.

Mr. PADGETT. But the House has the right, under the rule, to proceed with the consideration of this business.

Mr. MAHON. I will simply state to the House that all of the Committee on War Claims are satisfied with the arrangement the chairman made, for we get this day 85 bills out of this Calendar; and if this motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, I ask the House to vote it down.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. SNODGRASS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SNODGRASS. I rise to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on War Claims how many bills are on the Calendar now from the Senate?

Mr. MAHON. A great number of them, but there are a large number of House bills before them.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Could we not have time to consider the Senate bills to-day?

Mr. MAHON. No; we have to take them up in their order.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Did the gentleman make any effort to secure time for the consideration of Senate bills?

Mr. MAHON. No; because you must take up the bills as they are on the Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] a question or two. I should like to know if he can state the number of salaries which are increased by this bill and the amounts?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That information should be obtainable from the report of the conference committee.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I thought the gentleman could make a brief statement.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There are very few salaries raised by the Senate. I do not think the report gives the exact number, but very few as compared with the number of salaries in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering House bill 16228, and pending that motion, I ask for the recognition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER], on the part of the other side, for division of the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 16228.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PADGETT. I rose to make a parliamentary inquiry, but it is now too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PADGETT. It is too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman that the motion while stated has not yet been put.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to raise the question of consideration upon this bill.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to ask if it would be in order to make a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of claims reported from the Committee on War Claims?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would.

Mr. PADGETT. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of claims on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. I rise to a question of order. That can not be entertained after the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey has been made until that is voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from New York that the precedents are all in favor of the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, as being of a higher character on this day, under the rule.

Mr. PAYNE. After the motion has already been made by the gentleman from New Jersey?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly. The two motions being pending, the Chair is bound to put that which is of the higher privilege. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that it has been so ruled many times. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that he was in doubt.

On a division there were—ayes 53, noes 83.

Mr. PADGETT. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were ordered: and the Speaker pro tempore appointed Mr. FOWLER and Mr. PADGETT.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 77.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 122, answering "present" 10, not voting 123; as follows:

Mr. ROBERTS with Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. BULL with Mr. GRIGGS.

Mr. CUSHMAN with Mr. FLEMING.

Mr. STORM with Mr. COCHRAN.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to raise the question of consideration on the bill on which it is now asked that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOWLER. On that I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only way the gentleman can get at that is to vote down the motion.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I do not understand that to be the rule. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I desire to raise the question of consideration upon this bill. This bill is before the House by reason of a rule reported on the 16th instant by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] who now occupies the chair as Speaker pro tempore. That rule provides that "House bill 16288, a bill providing for the issue and circulation of national-bank notes, shall have for the remainder of this session the same privilege that the rules give to bills reported by committees under the privilege given leave to report at any time." That report is found on page 2456 of the record of the proceedings of the House of February 16.

In answer to an inquiry by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], as follows:

If this rule is adopted, is it not true that all other business, except privileged business, can be displaced by this bill, and will be the special order in the absence of others?

Mr. DALZELL answered:

It can be called up at any time.

Mr. HEPBURN inquired:

And no other business can be transacted except by unanimous consent?

Mr. DALZELL answered:

Oh, yes; the question of consideration can be raised.

Further on the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] made this inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who presented the rule. Mr. LACEY said:

I want to ask the gentleman whether the consideration of this bill can be questioned on any day?

And Mr. DALZELL replied:

Undoubtedly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that the distinguished member of the Committee on Rules of this House, on the floor of this House, in presenting this rule, would not have made answer so positively and unequivocally to the distinguished members on that side of the House, or to any member on this side of the House, unless he felt he was right. This bill, as I understand it, and I shall not take the time of the House to quote precedents, or suggest any precedent to the Chair, because I am fully aware of the fact that the Chair is much more familiar with the parliamentary rules and customs of the House than I am, and if he has not the precedents by him, the able clerk of the Speaker, who is now at his hand, will give them to him—but this bill is given simply a privilege that any other bill has that comes from a committee which has the right to report at any time. If the committee were the Committee on Contested Elections, if it came from that committee—a committee of the highest privilege—we could raise the question of consideration. If it came from the great Committee on Ways and Means, we could raise the question of consideration.

If it came from the Committee on Appropriations, or any other of the great committees of this House, the House always has the right to determine whether or not it will consider any measure coming from those committees before the House, unless it is bound down and gagged by that modern invention by modern Congresses which aims to destroy the will of the House, namely, a rule reported from the Committee on Rules, which undertakes to prevent the House from exercising its will on any subject. But even the Committee on Rules has only given this Committee on Banking and Currency the right to call up for consideration this bill at any time. It simply puts it on the plane of other great committees, so that if the House desires to consider it you can have it, and if it does not desire to consider it we can vote the consideration down.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am always delighted to yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, this is a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman whether the House may not easily decide the question of consideration by voting upon that motion? If it does not wish to go into Committee of the Whole, does it not decide the question of consideration by voting on the motion?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will answer the gentleman frankly, yes. But I prefer for the House to determine whether it will consider this bill and thus end it or not and not simply decide to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House now and waste the balance of this day upon a bill which I know, and which the gentleman knows, will never become a law at this session.

Mr. MANN. And which the gentleman from Illinois hopes will not become a law at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. I join with the gentleman from Illinois in that hope.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am always glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the gentleman from Georgia aware that, where there is a motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill, then the only way to prevent its consideration is to vote down that motion; that the question of consideration can not be entertained by the House in any other way?

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand it may have been so held, but my authority for my position is greater than that of the distinguished gentleman from New York; it is the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania who now occupies the Chair, and I appeal from the judgment of the gentleman from New York to the judgment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I accept it now. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania decide.

Mr. BARTLETT. He has to decide it, of course. [Laughter.] I was simply undertaking to recall to the attention of this House and of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the frank and candid statement which that gentleman made to this House when we adopted this rule, and I undertake to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania on that occasion did not undertake or desire to mislead the members on this floor by anything he may have said in the presentation of this resolution to the House.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BARTLETT. Most assuredly.

Mr. OLMSTED. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to an authority which perhaps he will respect, because it comes from the late Speaker Crisp, of his own State, and is upon this very point.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will gladly hear the authority.

Mr. OLMSTED. It is that a motion to go into Committee of the Whole does in effect raise the question of consideration, and, that motion having been made, it can not be raised otherwise.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will gladly hear the authority, of course.

Mr. OLMSTED (reading):

On Febuary 7, 1894, Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, presented as a matter of privilege the bill (H. R. 4956) directing the coinage of the silver bullion held in the Treasury, and for other purposes, heretofore reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. Bland moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider said bill.

Mr. Charles Tracey, of New York, demanded that the question of consideration be put.

The Speaker held that it was not in order to demand the question of consideration against the motion of Mr. Bland, opposition to the consideration of the proposed measure being available by voting down the pending motion.

The language of Mr. Speaker Crisp in making this decision will be found reported in Mr. Hinds's excellent work on Parliamentary Precedents, page 448, section 835.

The motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] is that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill. The decision of the House upon that motion of itself determines the question of consideration which my friend from Georgia seeks to raise in another and unparliamentary way as applied to this bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was a Democratic House, and we then had Democratic precedents. Now it is a Republican House, and we have the precedents of a Republican Speaker or a Republican presiding officer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no difference between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and the Chair on this question, except a difference of form. The present occupant of the chair stated the other day on the floor of the House that the question of consideration could be raised on this bill. Now, there are two methods of raising the question of consideration. One of them applies to bills on the House Calendar and the other to bills on the Union Calendar. As to bills on the House Calendar, the question of consideration is raised directly by an appeal to the House, the bill being in the House. As to bills that are in the custody of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and on the Union Calendar, the question is raised by voting down the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, in which committee the bill is pending. So that it is perfectly apparent that between the attitude of the present occupant of the chair in his ruling now and his attitude while on the floor the other day there is no possible inconsistency.

Mr. BARTLETT. I accept the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 16228.

The question being taken, there were (on a division called for by Mr. BARTLETT and others)— ayes 84, noes 75.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, upon such a close vote I demand tellers.

Mr. FOWLER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 80, answered "present" 16, not voting 128; as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:
For the session:
Mr. BROWNLOW with Mr. PIERCE.
For the balance of the day:
Mr. PARKER of New Jersey with Mr. GAINES of Tennessee.
Mr. LANDIS with Mr. BOWIE.
Mr. BOUTELL with Mr. GRIGGS.
Mr. CURTIS with Mr. BURGESS.
Mr. SIBLEY with Mr. FLOOD.
Mr. POWERS of Maine with Mr. HOOKER.
Mr. THOMAS of Iowa with Mr. LINDSAY.
Mr. JACKSON of Maryland with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.
Mr. STORM with Mr. FLEMING.
Mr. SCHIRM with Mr. NEVILLE.
For this vote:
Mr. BULL with Mr. PADGETT.
Mr. WATSON with Mr. GRIFFITH.
Mr. MORRELL with Mr. LEWIS of Georgia.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no," but I was paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. LANDIS. It was my mistake and I desire to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BOWIE, and he answered "present."

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I voted by mistake. I was paired with Mr. WATSON and I wish to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman.

The name of Mr. GRIFFITH was called, and he answered "present."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman.

The name of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee was called and he voted "aye."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the ayes are 118, the nays 89, answering present 14. The ayes have it. Accordingly, the House resolves itself——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House has passed that motion.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is a dilatory motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A motion to reconsider is not a dilatory motion. I have never heard of a motion to reconsider being dilatory. Certainly, the House has a right to reconsider its vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that he has made a mistake in putting that motion. The House has already resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAY. But the Chair has not yet announced it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did announce it, and was interrupted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But after the motion to adjourn has been submitted——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will look at the precedents.

Mr. HAY. The Chair had already ruled on the point of order.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I find that I am paired with Mr. BOUTELL, and I would like to withdraw my vote. I voted "no."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman.

The name of Mr. GRIGGS was called, and he answered "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of any precedent, the Chair is of opinion that the House having determined to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the announcement having been partially made, the motion of the gentleman from Virginia is not in order.

Mr. HAY. From that decision, Mr. Speaker, I most respectfully appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that he now finds he is sustained by precedent. The Chair will call the gentleman's attention to what has been called to his attention. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that this very question was passed upon by Mr. Speaker Carlisle in the Forty-ninth Congress, and he held that the House having determined by a yea-and-nay vote to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, a motion to adjourn was not in order.

Mr. HAY. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FOWLER. I make the point of order that that is clearly dilatory—the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that the Chair having announced that the House had resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the mere announcement of the Chair afterwards that he would not entertain another motion, or a motion to adjourn, is not a decision that can be appealed from, because the House had already discontinued its existence by the declaration of the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on that proposition it is clear that the House has not surrendered itself to the Committee of the Whole until the Speaker announces whom he calls to the chair and is ready to surrender the gavel, which has not been done in this case. The House still has control of its own decisions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The House could not know what the Chair was going to decide.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it in the power of the Speaker to continue the business of the House after the House has resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House? That settles that proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but it is still in the power of the House to act.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The House could act, but the Speaker can not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Until the Speaker announces whom he calls to the chair the House is not in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Ohio. The parliamentary situation is now that the gentleman from Virginia has made a motion to adjourn. The Chair has held that that motion is not in order, and from that decision of the Chair the gentleman from Virgiania has appealed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, my point of order is this—it is a very simple one: The House agreed to the resolution to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a certain bill. The Chair announced that the ayes had it, and that the House had so resolved itself. Thereupon a motion to adjourn was made. That motion was not in order. The rule is well laid down here, and is a part of the rules of the House. Thereupon an appeal was proposed from the decision of the Chair.

My point is that the Chair has no authority to entertain the appeal, because the result of that appeal would be to negative the action of the House already taken, and the only thing that the Chair could do was to announce the name of the presiding officer of the Committee of the Whole. If that were not so the Chair might refuse to allow the House to go into Committee of the Whole. In other words, the body itself has put an end to its existence for the purpose of a motion to adjourn, and the Chair has no power to entertain a motion that if carried would render nugatory the action of the House itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in answer to what the gentleman from Ohio has said, I simply wish to call the attention of the Chair to this fact: There must be a time and a definite time when we are in the House and when we are in the Committee of the Whole. Now, the House may by a vote resolve to do a certain act, but as long as the Speaker occupies that chair the mace is on the stand and we are in the House. And if any man is guilty of disorderly conduct while the Speaker is in the chair and the mace is on the stand, the House can punish him for that disorderly conduct; whereas if the Speaker had left the chair and the mace had left the stand we would be in the Committee of the Whole, and to punish a member for disorderly conduct we would have to rise and go back into the House.

Now, as it stands this minute, if I was guilty of disrespect, the Speaker is in the chair and the Sergeant-at-Arms could come here and put me under arrest for that disrespect. But when the Speaker calls a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to occupy that chair, that power ceases, and the Chairman does not have the privilege of asserting that power. So there is a definite time when that power ceases and when it does not. Now, I say it is clear that there can be but one time, and that is when the Speaker of the House announces the decision of the House and calls a member from this floor to occupy the chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And vacates the chair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. To the fact that when the Speaker has announced that the motion is agreed to, the rule is imperative upon him that he shall leave the chair. Now, can an officer, by refusing to obey the rule, confer a function upon himself that he would not have and could not have exercised if he had instantly obeyed the rule of the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, certainly, there is one thing that the Chair could absolutely do, and I will call the attention of the Chair to it now, showing that he has not surrendered his authority. A motion to reconsider was made, a parliamentary motion. There might be some good reason why, after we had determined to resolve the House into Committee of the Whole, that a motion to reconsider might lie and the Chair believe it not dilatory. He ruled this out of order, because he said it was dilatory. But suppose, in the opinion of the Chair, the Speaker had determined that the motion was not a dilatory motion. Was it not yet within the power of the House to reconsider the other vote, to reconsider the vote by which we determined to go into Committee of the Whole, and recall the power of the House? Why, certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Even assuming that the Chair had made his announcement, would it not still be in order to demand a recapitulation of the vote to verify it, and could that demand be made except in the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if we were in committee, the rule of the committee requires a different proceeding.

Mr. FINLEY. Would not the fact of the demand, if a call of the House was made, carry with it the fact that we were still in the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not hear the gentleman's question sufficiently well to understand it.

Mr. FINLEY. I mean a call for a recapitulation of the vote for the purpose of verifying the vote.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That would have to be done before the vote was announced. But I was, Mr. Speaker, showing that it was in the power of the House to reconsider, if the Chair believes it is not a dilatory motion. Why, then, there is power left with the Speaker, and the Speaker has not surrendered his functions. Therefore, if he is still occupying the functions of Speaker, he might make a mistake in ruling, and the House has the right to determine that question, and the right of appeal lies up to the time that he announces that the House has resolved itself into Committee of the Whole and calls a member to the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the Chair was about to announce the vote when the gentleman from Tennessee moved to reconsider. Somebody on that side made the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee was dilatory, and the Chair sustained the point of order. Well, if the contention which is now made by the gentleman from Ohio is correct, the Chair had no right then to sustain the point of order, or to entertain the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, or to announce the motion as dilatory. That being the case, I moved that the House adjourn, before the Speaker had proceeded further to state who he was to call to the chair or to make any other statement in regard to it. Somebody made the point of order that my motion to adjourn was a dilatory motion, and I therefore appealed from the decision of the Chair. It does seem to me that the House has the right to vote as to what particular period or any particular period when we shall adjourn. When we are in the House a member has the right to make the motion to adjourn, and it is plain that my motion was not dilatory, because it is now twenty minutes past 4 o'clock. I do not think it is dilatory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House having determined by a vote of 118 to 89 to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the Chair proceeded to announce that the ayes had it, and was going to make the further formal announcement, when interrupted by the gentleman from Tennessee with a motion to reconsider. The point of order was made that the gentleman's motion was dilatory, and in view of what had taken place prior thereto the Chair sustained the point of order.

Now, whatever may be the theoretical view of the functions of the Speaker at that stage of the proceedings, there is no doubt at all that he still continued de facto to be exercising the functions of the Speaker; and the clerk to the Speaker's table informs the Chair that a great many Speakers—Mr. Carlisle, Mr. Keifer, and the present Speaker of the House—have entertained points of order at that stage of the proceedings.

The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to adjourn is out of order, and has so decided; but, having thus far exercised the function of Speaker, and passed on the question of order, it seems to him that when the appeal has been taken it must be entertained. The Chair will put the question. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 69.

Mr. HAY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 74, answered "present" 17, not voting 150, as follows:

Mr. ADAMS with Mr. BENTON.
Mr. DARRAGH with Mr. BALL of Texas.
For the balance of the day:
Mr. WEEKS with Mr. POU.
Mr. TOMPKINS of New York with Mr. MUTCHLER.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Accordingly the House, in pursuance of its former vote, resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16228) to provide for the issue and circulation of bank notes, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BARTLETT. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Alabama has not the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia calls for the regular order. Objection is made, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any national bank may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, take out for issue and circulation an amount of national-bank notes not exceeding 25 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital without depositing United States bonds with the United States Treasury in the manner provided by existing law.

SEC. 2. That said national-bank notes shall be furnished by the United States at the expense of the respective banks issuing them, and shall be in the denominations of $10 and multiples thereof.

SEC. 3. That before any national bank shall receive any of the bank notes referred to in this act it shall first deposit in the Treasury of the United States as a guaranty of the payment thereof an amount of United States bonds or gold coin, or both, equal to 5 per cent of the amount of the notes so taken out, and such deposit shall be counted as a part of the lawful reserve of said bank against said notes. The interest upon said bonds shall be paid to the bank so depositing them, and if said bank shall retire said circulation, or any portion thereof, an amount of bonds or gold coin, or both, equal to 5 per cent of the notes so retired shall be returned to said bank: Provided, however, That if it should be necessary to sell said bonds for the purposes defined in this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to dispose of the same and use the proceeds in accordance with the provisions of law herein contained.

SEC. 4. That every national bank taking out such notes for issue and circulation shall, on the 1st days of January and July of each year, pay into the Treasury of the United States, in gold coin, a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent upon the average amount of such notes in actual circulation during the preceding six months, and the tax so paid into the Treasury shall, with the 5 per cent deposited as a guaranty for the payment of the notes, constitute a guaranty fund.

SEC. 5. That such notes shall be a first lien upon the assets of the respective banks issuing them, and shall be received upon deposit and for all purposes of debt and liability by every national bank at par and without any charge of whatsoever kind, and such notes shall be receivable for all public dues except duties on imports, and when so received shall be paid out again.

SEC. 6. That any national bank having notes outstanding in excess of 75 per cent of its paid-up capital, to secure the payment of which United States bonds have been deposited, may, upon the deposit of lawful money for the redemption of such excess, take out for circulation the notes provided for in this act, without reference to the limitation of $3,000,000 each month prescribed in section 9 of the act approved July 12, 1882.

SEC. 7. That the provisions of the law contained in section 9 of the act approved July 12, 1882, limiting the amount of notes that may be retired to $3,000,000 in any calendar month, shall not apply to the notes taken out in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That every national bank taking out such notes for issue shall maintain at all times the same reserve against such notes when in actual circulation as is now prescribed by law for deposits.

SEC. 9. That the bank notes taken out for issue in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be redeemed on demand in gold coin over the counter of the bank issuing them, and if said bank is located outside of one of the redemption cities hereinafter established, it shall then select a national bank as its agent in a redemption city, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, which shall upon demand redeem said notes in gold coin.

SEC. 10. That for the purposes of this act New York, Chicago, and San Francisco shall be redemption cities, and all the national banks redeeming their notes at any one of these cities shall constitute a redemption district, and the New York redemption district shall be known as redemption district No. 1, the Chicago redemption district as redemption district No. 2, and the San Francisco redemption district as redemption district No. 3.

SEC. 11. That if any national bank shall receive such circulating notes of any other national bank located outside of its own district it shall not pay them out over its own counter, but shall forward them either to some bank in the district to which the notes belong, or to some bank located in the redemption city of its own district, and then they shall be returned to the bank issuing them or to some bank in the district to which the bank issuing them belongs.

SEC. 12. That upon the failure of a national bank any national-bank notes that have been taken out by it in accordance with the provisions of this act shall, upon presentation to the United States Treasury, be paid in gold coin out of the guaranty fund; but the United States Treasury shall recover from the assets of the failed bank an amount equal to its outstanding notes, and the same shall be paid into the guaranty fund.

SEC. 13. That any national bank desiring to go into liquidation shall first pay into the guaranty fund an amount of gold coin equal to the amount of its notes then outstanding.

SEC. 14. That if such fund shall, for any reason, fall below an amount equal to 3 per cent of the total amount of the bank notes taken out in accordance with the provisions of this act, the Comptroller may impose an extraordinary tax, not exceeding 1 per cent in any one year, upon the amount of the notes at the time outstanding; but such extraordinary tax shall be refunded to the respective banks whenever such repayment shall not reduce such fund below an amount equal to 5 per cent of all the notes outstanding.

During the reading of the bill, and when the first paragraph had been read, the following occurred:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order until after the reading of the bill has been concluded.

After the completion of the reading of the bill:

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16228, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9632. An act for the allowance of claims of certain citizens of Virginia for damages to their property incident to the encampment at Manassas and march from Camp Alger to Thoroughfare Gap, Virginia, as recommended by a board of officers appointed for the consideration of claims for damages to property by volunteer soldiers during the war with Spain; and

H. R. 12141. An act to amend an act entitled "An act amending section 4708 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to pensions to remarried widows," approved March 3, 1901.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SWANN was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of George F. Flinn, Fifty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. KNAPP was granted leave of absence for two days on account of sickness in family.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for carrying out an agreement with the Choctaws and Chickasaws—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the ship Washington, Aaron Foster, master, against The United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an additional estimate of appropriation for naval service—to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HEATWOLE, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate (S. C. Res. 50) for printing 1,600 copies of Bills and Debates in Congress Relating to Trusts, prepared by the Attorney-General, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3819); which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate (S. C. Res. 52) providing for the printing of a compilation, under the direction of the Attorney-General, of all the laws of the several States relating to trusts, or to combinations in restraint of trade and commerce, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3820); which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution of the House (H. C. Res. 65) for printing and binding 8,000 copies of the Gazetteer of the Philippine Islands, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3821); which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate (S. C. Res. 48) for printing 5,000 copies of the Reports on the Law of Civil Government under Military Occupation, by Charles E. Magoon, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3823); which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BABCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17466) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3824); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 65) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3833); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Insular Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15520) to establish a standard of value and to provide for a coinage system in the Philippine Islands (with Senate amendments thereto), reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 3834); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 6048) granting a pension to Lillian G. Elkins, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3835); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 17481) authorizing the recorder of the General Land Office to issue certified copies of patents, records, books, and papers—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SENATE.

[Continuation of session of Thursday, February 19, 1903.]

At 11 o'clock a. m., Saturday, February 21, 1903, the recess having expired, the Senate reassembled in executive session. At 11 o'clock and 20 minutes a. m. the doors were reopened.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, do we have now the regular order of morning business—the presentation of petitions, the reports of committees, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions, and so forth—or is it in order to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As to this legislative day, the regular morning hour has expired, and the Senate is simply now in legislative session.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16) to provide for the erection of a bronze equestrian statue to the memory of the late Brig. Gen. Count Casimir Pulaski at Washington, D. C.

Mr. PENROSE. Had we not better go on with the morning business?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the question I asked of the President of the Senate just now, and he stated that the morning business for this legislative day had been disposed of.

Mr. PENROSE. That is only a technicality. There is morning business here to be presented.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am willing that morning business shall be received.

Mr. BACON. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will state his point of order.

Mr. BACON. My point of order is that the new legislative day will not begin until the hour of noon by our rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The new legislative day will not commence until the Senate adjourns.

Mr. CULLOM. And that has not occurred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And that has not yet occurred.

Mr. BACON. That is in accord with the suggestion I was making, and therefore morning business is not now necessarily in order, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not until this legislative day has been concluded.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] that I have no objection whatever, of course, to the introduction of bills or anything of that kind. I rose to ask the Chair that very question, and the Chair decided that morning business was not now in order, having been concluded at our last session, and therefore, and only therefore, I asked for the present consideration of a little bill, not to take away from Senators the privilege of introducing bills, reports, or resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] has the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 2840, being House bill No. 16.

Mr. PENROSE. I object until the introduction of bills and other morning business has been gone through with.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am perfectly willing that shall be done. I only want the Senator from Pennsylvania to understand that I am entirely in order in making the request I have made, and that it is not a technicality.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is only an hour to be given to legislative business. If there be no objection, the Chair will receive morning business.

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL, ILLINOIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation for Rock Island Arsenal, Rock Island, Ill., $185,000, to replace a storehouse destroyed by fire February 11, 1903; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 17046) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 9632) for the allowance of claims of certain citizens of Virginia for damages to their property incident to the encampment at Manassas, and march from Camp Alger to Thoroughfare Gap, Virginia, as recommended by a board of officers appointed for the consideration of claims for damages to property by volunteer soldiers during the war with Spain; and

A bill (H. R. 12141) to amend an act entitled "An act amending section 4708 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to pensions to remarried widows," approved March 3, 1902.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENROSE presented petitions of the Trinity Lutheran Sunday School, of Milton; of Sunbury Council, No. 31, Daughters of Liberty, of Sunbury; of D. Faust, of Philadelphia; of the congregation of the First United Evangelical Church, of Sunbury; of the congregation of the West Washington Methodist Episcopal Church of Washington; of the congregation of St. Matthew's Lutheran Church of Bloomsburg, and of 745 citizens of Washington, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Government buildings; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GAMBLE presented the petition of D. L. Printup, of Britton, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation to reinstate graduates of the Naval Academy who have been honorably discharged; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Rev. O. W. Butterfield, of Groton, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation granting to the States power to deal with intoxicating liquors which may be shipped into their territory from other States; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. QUARLES. I present a telegram, in the nature of a petition, from the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the ratification of the reciprocity treaty with Cuba. I ask that the telegram lie on the table and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

MILWAUKEE, WIS., February 20, 1903.

Hon. J. V. QUARLES, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following unanimously adopted this day by the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Milwaukee: "Resolved, That it is the urgent desire of this association that the treaty now pending in the United States Senate for reciprocal relations between this country and Cuba be ratified during the present session of Congress. And the Senators from this State are respectfully requested to use their best endeavors."

E. A. WADHAMS,
President.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Hebron, of the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal and Christian churches, of Burroak, and of D. S. Welch and sundry other citizens of Newton, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Lincoln Post, No. 1, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, of Topeka, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation placing monuments, tablets, or other memorials in any Government buildings or grounds to commemorate the deeds of ex-soldiers of the Confederate army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Bookbinders' Local Union, No. 23, American Federation of Labor, of Topeka, Kans., praying for the repeal of the so-called desert-land law and the commutation clause of the homestead act; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Wichita, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petitions of James George and sundry other citizens of Newton, Kans., and the petition of Mrs. Ellen Gray and sundry other citizens of Newton, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Government buildings; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MASON presented a memorial of the Seattle Bridge Company, of the State of Washington; the sanitary district of Chicago, Ill.; the General Charles Fitz Simons & Connell Company, contractors, of Chicago, Ill.; and of E. T. Williams & Sons, contractors, of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to renew and extend certain letters patent granted to Alphonso B. Bowers, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a memorial of the Trades and Labor Council, American Federation of Labor, of Danville, Ill., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the giving of presents, coupons, or promises of gifts with cigars and tobaccos; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13660) for the relief of Jackson Pryor, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 17th instant proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the construction of a gravel road from the Shiloh National Military Park to the city of Corinth, Miss., with necessary bridges, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16970) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments and to submit a written report thereon. I give notice that at an early day I shall call up the bill for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 7049) for the relief of the creditors of the Deposit Savings Association, of Mobile, Ala., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 2199) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Jonas Albert; and

A bill (H. R. 5028) for the relief of Francis M. Oliver.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 7387) for establishing further aids to navigation in Delaware Bay and River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 7388) making an appropriation to the board of trustees of the Philadelphia Museums for the care and installation of the raw and manufactured products and commercial materials for the benefit of the commerce of the State of Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 7389) granting a pension to Thomas Irvin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GAMBLE introduced a bill (S. 7390) to ratify and amend an agreement with the Sioux tribe of Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 7391) for the relief of Richard J. Kemball; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURTON introduced a bill (S. 7392) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam across the Kansas River within the counties of Shawnee and Wabaunsee, in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 7393) providing for the better separation and utilization of public and private lands within the limits of railroad land grants in the arid and semiarid regions of the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made of Penobscot River, Maine, with a view to widening the channel from Crosby Narrows to the Bangor and Brewer Bridge, and also near Stearns's Mill.

STATUE TO BRIG. GEN. COUNT CASIMIR PULASKI.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 2840, being House bill No. 16.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask what is the title of the bill?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is the bill (H. R. 16) to provide for the erection of a bronze equestrian statue to the memory of the late Brig. Gen. Count Casimir Pulaski at Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which will be read to the Senate for its information.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of the bill at this time. I am somewhat astonished at the request of the junior Senator from Indiana in view of the suggestion which has been made regarding this bill. The senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] and I have followed this bill rather closely during the whole session; and we had an arrangement with the chairman of the Committee on the Library [Mr. WETMORE] that when the bill was called up the senior Senator from Indiana, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS], and myself should have an opportunity to submit some remarks on the Polish people. The distinct understanding was that the bill should not be called up without consultation with either one of us, as we desired to submit some remarks upon the measure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have no objection to the Senators doing so.

Mr. PENROSE. I had not expected that we should have a legislative hour this morning, and, so far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to make the remarks which I have in mind upon this bill at this time. I therefore object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I rise to a personal explanation. I had not the slightest knowledge of the facts stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. The only reason I called this bill up was because I received a request to do so. I did not know that the Senator from Pennsylvania or any other Senator desired to submit remarks upon the bill. It will be perfectly agreeable to me to have the Senators make remarks upon it; but, as I have stated, I called up the bill because I had a request from some of my constituents to do so. I am willing that the bill shall be considered now or at some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill retains its place on the Calendar.

FORT SMITH RESERVATION, ARK.

Mr. BACON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15595) confirming and ceding jurisdiction to the State of Arkansas over certain lands formerly in the Fort Smith Reservation in said State, and asserting and retaining Federal jurisdiction over certain other lands in said reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which will be read in full to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby confirmed and ceded to the State of Arkansas over all those portions of the Fort Smith Reservation which have heretofore been aliened by the United States either to the city of Fort Smith in trust or otherwise, or to other parties; and complete Federal jurisdiction is hereby asserted and retained over all portions of the said reservation that have not been specially aliened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. If there is a report with that bill, I ask that it may be read.

Mr. BACON. Yes; there is a House report.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there a Senate report?

Mr. BACON. This bill is recommended by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and it has passed the House of Representatives. It relates to an insignificant piece of ground in the city of Fort Smith. The House report states that, in the opinion of the committee, jurisdiction has already been ceded over it, but as that has been disputed by some, it has been thought better that this bill should be passed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well; I have no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I desire to make my usual request, with, I presume, the usual result, that on Thursday, the 26th day of this month, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, a vote shall be taken on the bill known as the omnibus statehood bill, on all amendments then pending, and on all amendments then offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on Thursday, the 26th day of February, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, the votes may be taken on the bill known as the omnibus statehood bill, on all amendments pending, and all amendments then offered, without further debate. Is there objection?

Mr. DEPEW. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

MAJ. JOHN MURPHY.

Mr. ALGER. I renew my request for unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 1341) to amend the record of Maj. John Murphy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That John Murphy, late major of the Fifty-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States of date October 8, 1865, and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue for the said Murphy a certificate of honorable discharge in accordance with the terms of this act: Provided, That no pay or allowances shall become due or payable to any person by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALEB C. VAN SICKELL.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 16522, a pension bill, which will take but a moment. I will state that the pensioner is over 80 years of age, and it is important that the bill should be promptly acted upon.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 16522) granting an increase of pension to Caleb C. Van Sickell. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Caleb C. Van Sickell, late first lieutenant Company I, Fourth Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LUCY A. HARDING.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to report favorably two Senate pension bills which have been overlooked. Whilst I have little hope that they will pass the other House, I will ask that they be now considered. They will take but a moment. I report first the bill (S. 1361) granting an increase of pension to Lucy A. Harding, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Lucy A. Harding, widow of Sidney A. Harding, late of Company A, Eighty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALFRED WOODMAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now report from the Committee on Pensions, without amendment, the other bill to which I have referred, being the bill (S. 7375) granting an increase of pension to Alfred Woodman, for which I also ask present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Alfred Woodman, late of Company B, Second Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the time, and passed.

AUSTIN A. YATES.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4178) for the relief of Austin A. Yates.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Austin A. Yates, late captain, Fourteenth Veteran Reserve Corps, and to give him credit for $13,537.50, charged to him on the books of the Second Auditor's Office, that sum having been stolen from the safe of his office at Syracuse, N. Y., on the night of March 25, 1865, while he was acting provost-marshal of the twenty-third district of New York; but it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the accounting officers that Captain Yates was not responsible for the loss.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MUSCLE SHOALS (ALABAMA) DAM.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 14051) granting the consent of Congress to N. F. Thompson and associates to erect a dam and construct power station at Muscle Shoals, Alabama.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTORS OF JAMES P. WILLETT.

Mr. CLAPP. I now renew my request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3510) for the relief of the executors of James P. Willett, deceased, late postmaster of the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the executors of James P. Willett, deceased, late postmaster of the District of Columbia, who lost his life through an open shaft in the new city post-office building on September 30, 1899, $5,000, to be distributed as provided by the laws of the District of Columbia in cases of recovery of damages for death by negligence.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALIEN HOLDINGS OF REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6158) to amend the act entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories," approved March 2, 1897.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes that the act referred to be amended so as to extend to aliens the same rights and privileges concerning the acquisition, holding, owning, and disposition of real estate in the District of Columbia as by that act are conferred upon them in respect of real estate in the Territories of the United States.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to have the report accompanying the bill published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks that the report be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The report submitted by Mr. DILLINGHAM June 19, 1902, is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6158) to amend the act entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories," approved March 2, 1897, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill has the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as will appear by the following letter:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, June 7, 1902.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to transmit herewith a draft of a bill entitled "A bill to amend the act entitled 'An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories,' approved March 2, 1897," with recommendation for its early enactment.

A bill substantially similar to this was introduced in both Houses of Congress during the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress at the instance of the Commissioners. The Commissioners were led to request its enactment by the frequency with which individual bills for the relief of aliens holding real estate in the District of Columbia had been presented, and the fact that they had invariably been the subject of favorable report by the Commissioners and of action by Congress.

A copy of the opinion of the attorney for the District at the time the Commissioners submitted the former draft is herewith transmitted.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, December 28, 1899.

GENTLEMEN: Complying with your request, made in connection with report on the bill for the relief of John A. Narjes (S. 115, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session), I have the honor to submit herewith the draft of a bill to amend the act of Congress approved March 2, 1897, entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories," extending its provisions to aliens acquiring and owning real estate in the District of Columbia.

By the act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories and the District of Columbia to American citizens, approved March 3, 1887 (24 Stat., 476), Congress placed the District of Columbia under identically the same inhibitions in respect to the subject-matter as the Territories.

Thereafter, by act approved March 9, 1888 (25 Stat., 45), it amended the act of 1887 so that it should not apply or operate in the District of Columbia so far as it relates to the ownership of legations or residences by representatives of foreign governments or attachés thereof.

Since the passage of the first-named act numerons applications for individual relief from its operation have been made to Congress, and special acts have been passed granting such relief. So far as my knowledge extends no such application has been refused.

In my judgment, this has unnecessarily consumed much of the valuable time of Congress.

I am unable to understand why the District of Columbia should not be put upon equally as good footing as the Territories in respect of this matter, and I am of the opinion that you should request that the provisions of act approved March 2, 1897, "to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories" be extended to the District of Columbia.

The act of 1887 affects alien residents of the District, while the act of 1897 exempts aliens who are bona fide residents from its operations.

Moreover, the act of 1897 does not apply to lots in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village in the Territories, being a plain manifestation that the mischief to be remedied was not ownership of small parcels of land, such as city lots.

The act of 1887 forfeits to the United States all property held or owned in violation of its provisions, while the act of 1897 allows aliens to dispose of their real estate before the institution of escheat proceedings, and even after sale under such proceedings the proceeds are subject to the order of the alien owner for a period of one year.

If, for any reason, Congress should determine that the time has not arrived for the absolute repeal of the act of 1887, so far as the District of Columbia is concerned, it seems to me that no good reason can be assigned for subjecting the District to continued loss in investment in or improvement of its real estate consequent upon the stringent provisions of the act of 1887. The condition would be materially ameliorated by the proposed amendment.

Very respectfully,

A. B. DUVALL,
Attorney District of Columbia.

The COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAFETY APPLIANCES ON RAILROADS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3560) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1893, and amended April 1, 1896.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. FORAKER, Mr. MILLARD, and Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana were appointed.

LAVINIA COOK.

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1027) granting a pension to Lavinia Cook.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Lavinia Cook, widow of Reuben Cook, late of Captain Loyall's company, Georgia Volunteers, Creek Indian war, and to pay her a pension of $8 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUMBERLAND RIVER BRIDGE AT CARTHAGE, TENN.

Mr. CARMACK. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16909) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Carthage, Tenn.," approved March 2, 1901.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 5 of the act referred to so as to make it read as follows:

That this act shall be null and void if said bridge is not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the 1st day of April, 1903.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS RIVER BRIDGE AT MOORS ROCK, ARKANSAS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17204) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Moors Rock, in the State of Arkansas.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committe of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS SEGREGATED FOR RESERVOIR PURPOSES.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5279) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to restore to public entry lands embraced in whole or in part within segregations for reservoirs.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that any or all of the lands heretofore included within reservations for reservoir purposes, made in accordance with the law approved October 2, 1888, and subsequent acts, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be thrown open to entry and settlement under the land laws as though such reservation had never been made if it has been ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior that such lands, or portions of tracts, are not needed for reservoir purposes, and can not probably be used in the future for such purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PEARL RIVER BRIDGE AT SMITHS FERRY, MISS.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 16509) to authorize the Pearl and Leaf Rivers Railroad Company to bridge Pearl River in the State of Mississippi.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE ISLAND OF GUAM.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, some days ago the bill (S. 6599) to provide a government for the island of Guam, and for other purposes, was taken up by unanimous consent and considered. The bill was read with the amendments reported by the committee. It then went over on the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who said he wanted to offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee relating to the extradition of fugitives from justice. The Senator from Massachusetts is not present in the Chamber, but before leaving he left with me the amendment, saying he would be entirely satisfied with the bill if his amendment is adopted. I wish to accept the amendment. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico with amendments.

The first amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That the provisions of section 1014 of the Revised Statutes, so far as applicable, shall apply throughout the United States for the arrest and removal therefrom to said island of any fugitive from justice charged with the commission of any crime or offense against the United States within said island, and shall apply within said island for the arrest and removal therefrom to the United States of any fugitive from justice charged with the commission of any crime or offense against the United States. Such fugitive may, by any judge or magistrate of said island, and agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders therein, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, pending the issuance of a warrant for his removal to the United States, which warrant it shall be the duty of a judge of the court of first instance seasonably to issue and of the officer or agent of the United States designated for the purpose to execute. Such officer or agent, when engaged in executing such warrant without said island, shall have all the powers of a marshal of the United States so far as such powers are requisite for the prisoner's safe-keeping and the execution of the warrant.

Mr. FORAKER. On behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, for the Senator from Massachusetts, offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 4 the following:

Provided, That whenever the extradition of a fugitive from justice from the United States to said island shall be sought, the proceedings shall be in accord with the provisions of section 5270 of the Revised Statutes and of section 5 of chapter 378 of the statues of 1882, approved August 3, 1882.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of sections 5278 and 5279 of the Revised Statutes, so far as applicable, shall apply to said island, which, for the purposes of said sections, shall be deemed a Territory within the meaning thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. FORAKER. I am informed that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON] this morning offered an amendment to the bill. I was not aware of it; and inasmuch as he is not now in the Chamber, I will ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over, in accordance with the request of the Senator from Ohio.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE ISLAND OF TUTUILA, ETC.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish, if the hour has expired, to move that the Senate resume the consideration of executive business. I should like to inquire if the hour has expired?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it has very nearly expired.

Mr. CULLOM. Then I move that the Senate resume its executive session.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish the Senator from Illinois would withhold the motion for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There remain five minutes of the hour.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood we were to have an hour in which to consider legislative business, and there is another bill, substantially like the one which has just been considered, providing civil government for the island of Tutuila, which ought to be passed along with the other bill.

While I am waiting for the Senator from Oregon to return to the Chamber, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 7054) to provide a government for the island of Tutuila and the islands adjacent thereto within the jurisdiction of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to know from which committee the bill comes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

Mr. FORAKER. It was unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish to object to the consideration of the bill, but I desire to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it would be difficult to dispose of it without some little discussion.

Mr. FORAKER. Of course, there is no time for discussion now. If the Senator wants to debate the bill, and will allow me to offer to this bill the amendments which were offered to the other, the bill may go over until there is an opportunity to debate it.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to that course, if the Senate will give it that direction, but there are some very grave questions arising on this bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that I think, so far as the island of Guam is concerned, there ought to be, of course, some legislation, but whether this is the particularly proper legislation is another question. I should be very glad to cooperate with him, so far as is in my power, when we have time for its consideration, in erecting a proper civil government in Guam.

As to Tutuila, I think there are other questions; but I will not now interrupt the Senator, as he simply desires, I understand, to offer certain amendments to the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I called up the bill providing for civil government in Guam, and it has been read and amended and reported to the Senate as amended. I asked that it might go over until the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON], who wants to offer an amendment, could come into the Chamber; and while waiting for him, I asked that the bill relating to Tutuila be taken up and read. I now wish to offer the same amendments to this bill that were attached to the bill as to Guam. I offer the same amendments, including the one offered by me on behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and after they are adopted I will ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments submitted by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That the provisions of section 1014 of the Revised Statutes, so far as applicable, shall apply throughout the United States for the arrest and removal therefrom to said islands of any fugitive from justice charged with the commission of any crime or offense against the United States within said islands, and shall apply within said islands for the arrest and removal therefrom to the United States of any fugitive from justice charged with the commission of any crime or offense against the United States. Such fugitive may, by any judge or magistrate of said islands, and agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders therein, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, pending the issuance of a warrant for his removal to the United States, which warrant it shall be the duty of a judge of the court of first instance seasonably to issue and of the officer or agent of the United States designated for the purpose to execute. Such officer or agent, when engaged in executing such warrant without said islands, shall have all the powers of a marshal of the United States so far as such powers are requisite for the prisoner's safe-keeping and the execution of the warrant: Provided, That whenever the extradition of a fugitive from justice from the United States to said islands shall be sought, the proceedings shall be in accord with the provisions of section 5270 of the Revised Statutes, and of section 5 of chapter 378 of the statutes of 1882, approved August 3, 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of sections 5278 and 5279 of the Revised Statutes, so far as applicable, shall apply to said island, which, for the purposes of said sections, shall be deemed a Territory within the meaning thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. Let the bill be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the bill as amended may be printed.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And also the bill as to Guam?

Mr. FORAKER. Both.

Mr. BACON. Both.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both bills will be printed as amended, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 17046) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 19th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 149) to provide for holding of terms of court in the district of Utah;

An act (S. 5678) providing for record of deeds and other conveyances and instruments in writing in Indian Territory, and for other purposes; and

An act (S. 7053) to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

ANTHRACITE COAL STRIKE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, with an accompanying draft of a joint resolution providing for the printing of the report of said Commission, and approve of the suggestion therein contained.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 21, 1903.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate resume its executive session.

Mr. MASON. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment, that I may give a notice?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield.

Mr. MASON. I give notice that I will ask the Senate at the earliest opportunity to take up the bill (H. R. 16990) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes. I should like to have it taken up this afternoon.

Mr. KEAN. That will include the statehood bill.

Mr. MASON. The bill has been enlarged somewhat. If it is not taken up this afternoon, on Monday, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I will ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 23, 1903, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 21, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the House, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOODY] to act as Speaker pro tempore during the exercises of to-morrow.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 6525) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 2 and 3 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended by the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1869," approved February 20, 1893, as amended by the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia,' approved February 5, 1901," be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That membership in this association shall be limited to Master Masons, and that the particular business and objects of the society or corporation shall be to provide and maintain a fund for the benefit of the widow, orphans, heir, assignee, or legatee of a deceased member immediately upon proof of such death; and for this purpose it shall and may be lawful for the said society or corporation to make all and every insurance appertaining to or connected with life risks of whatever kind and nature, and because of its fraternal and benevolent purposes it shall be defined and classed as a fraternal beneficial association: Provided, however, That upon all policies which shall be issued for a specified amount it shall be required to maintain a reinsurance reserve fund not less than that computed upon the American experience table of mortality at 4 per cent interest.

"SEC. 3. That the number of directors of said association shall be at least 21, a number of whom, less than a majority, shall be elected annually by the members of the association from among themselves and shall serve for three years; that the annual meeting of said association shall, after the year 1903, be held on the third Tuesday in February of each year, and for this purpose the terms of service of the present directors shall be, and are hereby, extended to the date of the annual meeting succeeding the expiration of their present terms of service. In all cases of a tie vote the choice to be determined by lot, and in all other cases a majority vote shall decide. And said directors shall, at their first meeting succeeding the annual meeting of the association, elect one of their number to be president of the board of directors, who shall also be president of the association, and shall elect one of their number as vice-president, and one of their number as secretary, and one of their number or a member of the association as secretary of the association, and the said secretary of the association shall give bonds with security to said association in such sum as the board of directors may require for the faithful discharge of his duties; and one of their number as treasurer, who shall also give bonds with surety to said association in such sum as the said board of directors may require for the faithful discharge of his trust. At all meetings of the board of directors a majority of the board shall form a quorum. In case of any vacancy in the board of directors, by death, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by the remaining directors from among the members of said association, who shall serve until the next annual meeting of the association, at which time a successor shall be elected to serve for the remainder of the unexpired term."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the District of Columbia has reported favorably a bill which is an exact copy of this bill. I hope that the House will agree to pass this bill and that then the corresponding House bill be laid on the table.

The Senate bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill (H. R. 17466) similar to the Senate bill just passed will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

EXPLANATION OF A PAIR.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement in reference to the RECORD. I was not in the House at the opening of this day's proceedings, or I should have made this explanation then. I desire only to say that my colleague, Mr. BRUNDIDGE, who is detained at his apartments on account of sickness, does not appear in yesterday's proceedings as having been paired. I am informed that he was in fact paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. KNAPP.

The SPEAKER. The fact as stated by the gentleman from Arkansas will appear in the RECORD.

DAUGHTERS OF AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill (S. 6515) to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution, in Washington, D. C., was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MOON. I object to the consideration of this or any other bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In view of the fact that the Daughters of the American Revolution, by subscriptions of 5 cents up to $10, contributed in all parts of the United States, have raised the money and purchased this lot of ground, I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MOON. I object to the consideration of the bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] is not in order.

ISSUE AND CIRCULATION OF NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16228) providing for the issue and circulation of national-bank notes. Pending this motion, I ask that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] be recognized in the Committee of the Whole as representing the other side, and that we have an equal division of the time.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion, the gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] be recognized to distribute or control the time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I shall object to that unless it be also agreed that I shall control one hour of the time. It is not necessary for me to state, unless pressed to do so, why I make this objection; but as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I object to such a disposition and control of the time.

Mr. THAYER. So far as concerns giving my colleague on the committee [Mr. BARTLETT] an hour's time, I thought it was perfectly understood between him and myself that he should have all the time he wanted, an hour or more, if it was in my power to grant it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. I object, unless the proposition be amended as I suggest. It is very well known that there is a difference of opinion between the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself on this question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Jersey modify his request so as to give the gentleman from Georgia one hour?

Mr. FOWLER. With the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. He has already given such consent. Therefore the request is modified accordingly. Is there further modification?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of House bill 16228.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER. The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I call for a division.

The question was again taken; and there were—ayes 83, noes 49.

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). There are 161 members present—not a quorum. The yeas and nays will be taken, under the rule. The Doorkeeper will cause the doors to be closed. The Clerk will call the roll, when members who are in favor of the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey will vote "aye;" those opposed, "no;" and those present and not desiring to vote will answer "present."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 97, answered "present" 12, not voting 104; as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will see that the doors are reopened.

Accordingly, in pursuance of the vote just taken, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16228) providing for the issue and circulation of bank notes, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the subject-matter of this bill is purely and simply a credit currency, or bank credits coined into currency. It should be distinctly understood, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Banking and Currency mean by a credit currency a currency for which there is always an adequate reserve in the coin of the country or its equivalent; second, that every note shall be currently redeemed in that coin on demand. The Republican members of the Banking and Currency Committee stand for no other kind of credit currency.

Who are in favor of a credit currency? This is an interesting fact for this committee to consider. In the first place, the 11 Republican members of this committee reported unanimously in favor of this bill. Second, all the minority members of this committee signed a report in favor of a credit currency, and I shall include in my remarks a part of their report which confirms this assertion.

The following is from the report of the minority members of the Banking and Currency Committee on H. R. 16228, pages 1 and 2:

> We are also of opinion that the present national-bank currency system is predicated upon an inadequate banking principle or theory. We do not believe that the bank-currency system of the country should rest and be predicated solely and absolutely upon a national debt, represented by Government bonds. Such a system necessarily perpetuates the public debt, and as the country grows and its business increases and the commerce demands an enlargement of currency the public debt must be increased in order to furnish the necessary bonds as the basis of such a national-bank currency. Moreover, under such a system fluctuation in the price of bonds, either from natural or fictitious causes, produces improper influences in the circulation of the currency and undue contraction thereof.
> It happens that when currency is scarce and most needed to meet the legitimate and necessary demands of business bonds are high, and it is found profitable to sell the bonds for speculation, and the currency is contracted when it should be expanded. On the other hand, when bonds are cheap the inducement is to issue currency at a time when the legitimate business of the country does not require it, thus encouraging and promoting hazardous speculation. These we consider improper banking conditions, and the currency of the country should not be predicated solely upon such conditions. We believe that the banks of the country, under proper and wise legislation, safeguarded so as to secure a sound and solvent currency, are the agents and instrumentalities to issue the currency of the country; and we further believe that the legislation should be so framed as to permit the issuance of an amount of currency at all times adequate and sufficient for the business needs of the country, and which would be retired when not needed for the transaction of legitimate business.

Next, all the Secretaries of the Treasury and all the Comptrollers of the Currency for the past twenty years, practically, with a single exception or two—men who have been called upon to investigate this subject because of their responsibility—have been and are in favor of a credit currency. Next, all of the students of this question who have a place in public esteem in this country are in favor of a credit currency. Lastly, all the countries of the world whose policies and relative places among the nations of the earth demand our respect are in favor of and use a credit currency, with the exception of England and our own country.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that England, too, recognizes a credit currency whenever the emergency arises. After the passage of the bank act of 1844, which was supposed to plant the currency of Great Britain upon coin or bullion alone, in every case where a crisis has arisen or has been threateningly impending the bank act has been suspended. It was suspended three years later, in 1847. It was suspended ten years later, in 1857, and nine years later, in 1866, and bank notes issued without reference to a deposit of gold coin or bullion; and preparations for its suspension have been frequently made since, with the uniform result of breaking the force of the panic and ending the crisis. The "currency principle," or a currency based on coin alone, proved a failure in both Amsterdam and Hamburg in 1764, and again in Hamburg in 1857. The United States Government also recognizes the principle of a credit currency on every occasion when it has issued clearing-house certificates.

What is a clearing-house certificate? It is a bank note issued by the clearing house and is based upon the assets of the banks deposited with the clearing house and therefore a credit note in identically the sense in which this bill recommends a credit currency. In 1884 the New York banks issued $24,915,000 of them. In 1890 they issued $15,205,000 of credit notes, or clearing-house certificates. In 1893 the New York banks issued $38,280,000 of credit notes, and Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Pittsburg $25,000,000 of credit notes. Therefore I assert that at no time whenever a great crisis has arisen has England or the United States or any other country found relief except in the expansive principle of issuing notes based upon credit or the goods in the country and not upon coin.

I desire here to read a sentence from a recent paper by J. Laurence Loughlin in support of this proposition, which is as follows:

It is in such circumstances as these, we shall find, that means of payment are created, based again on goods such as clearing-house certificates; or, as in England, by obtaining new reserves of notes based on consols by a suspension of the bank act. In short, a panic demonstrates that credit transactions are really based on goods; that liquidation never can be forced in money; and that the invariable remedy is some method of tiding over the emergency by creating means of payment based on goods (not specie) which will be acceptable by lenders from borrowers (e. g., clearing-house certificates).

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of this committee to certain facts that are confronting this Government and our people at this very moment. Our population is annually increasing at the rate of more than a million and a half. Therefore, if we shall continue to provide for them an amount of currency equal to that which they now have in hand, about $17.50 per capita, it will call for an annual increase of nearly $30,000,000. The annual production of the American people has reached already an amount possibly exceeding, certainly equaling, $20,000,000,000, which means a production of $250 for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

Of pig iron alone in 1897 we produced only 9,000,000 tons, whereas last year we produced 18,000,000 tons, an amount equal to the production of all the United Kingdom, Germany, and Belgium combined. Our manufactured products to-day are double those of the United Kingdom, and are equal those of Germany, France, and Russia. Our vast productions and incomparable position in the world is strikingly exhibited in the clearings of this country. In 1894 our clearings were but $45,000,000,000. Last year, in 1902, our clearings were $118,000,000,000. The clearings of New York City alone were $76,000,000,000, while those of London, the clearing house of the world, were only $50,000,000,000. The marvelous and matchless progress and prosperity of these times is reflected in another and still more significant way, and that is the deposits in our banks.

In 1892 the deposits in all our banks were $4,600,000,000, and now they pass $9,000,000,000. During the last four years there has been an increase of $3,500,000,000, or about $900,000,000 a year, which has annually called for nearly $200,000,000 of additional reserves, if as much as 20 per cent on the average be required.

I shall add or include in my remarks a table showing the deposits of all the banks year by year from 1892 to 1902, for which I now make my acknowledgments to the Comptroller's office, by which it was prepared.

Statement showing deposits from 1892 to 1902.

Now, in regard to the per capita circulation, I desire to say a word. In 1892 the total amount of money of all kinds in the country was $26.88 per capita; in 1902 it was $32.40. There was therefore a gain of $5.56. What became of it? Three dollars and fifty-four cents have gone into the reserves of the banks. Only $2.02 have gone into the hands of the people. In 1900 our per capita circulation in the hands of the people was $17.11. In 1902 it was only $17.59, a gain of only 48 cents during that time, while the actual gain was $1.73, the balance having gone into the reserves of the banks.

Now, gentleman, if our deposits are going to increase in the future as they have in the past, and there is every reason to believe that they will, where will these reserves come from to properly guarantee $900,000,000, nay, probably a billion, of additional deposits every year? The United States notes are a fixed quantity and stand at $346,000,000. Our silver is a fixed quantity and stands at $667,000,000.

Mr. FLEMING. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FOWLER. I should prefer not to yield. I would like to ask the courtesy of the House to go on and complete my statement before I attempt to answer any question, because I believe that I shall anticipate in the debate most of the questions that would otherwise be asked. Now, let me call the attention of this committee to the question of the balance of trade and gold supply, upon which unfortunately we are inclined to place a false reliance, thinking that if we are large producers of gold and have a balance of trade in our favor all will be well. From 1879 to 1902 we had a balance of trade in our favor of $4,844,000,000. We produced during the same period $995,000,000 of gold, making a total balance of trade and gold produced of $5,839,213,228. After we have made full allowance for our accumulation of gold, $1,250,000,000 on hand, there is owing to us still from the world $4,589,213,228. Gentlemen of the committee, is it difficult to imagine that the same forces that, so to speak, robbed us of $4,589,000,000 of gold during those twenty-two years might also have taken away $1,250,000,000 more, or all that we now have? Are we sure that we are not now living in a fool's paradise?

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has requested to be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. FOWLER. During the past five years the balance of trade with the production of gold from our mines would have left owing to us more than two billions and a half. Yet last fall the bankers of New York waked up to find that there was owing by the United States in the markets of England and continental Europe more than three hundred millions practically on demand, say at thirty, sixty, and ninety days. Oh! gentlemen, unfortunately for the solid and permanent prosperity of our country we now have no control over the movement of gold to and from this country, and never can have so long as the United States notes remain outstanding, because the Treasury is compelled to give gold away upon the presentation of these notes, since a charge of any kind for the gold would amount to repudiation. I use the word charge in the peculiar sense of this particular relation, viz, a charge for the use of the gold which ought to be expressed in a rate of interest overnight. Therefore I assert without any fear whatever of successful contradiction that we may or may not have an increase of money from our gold production and a favorable balance of trade, or either of them.

One other resort is left to us, and that is bank notes. In the last four years, or three and a half, our bank notes have increased $126,000,000. How do they happen to increase that amount? About seventy millions came from the funding act of March 14, 1900. Where did the balance come from? It came from the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to compel the issue of notes by threatening to withdraw deposits, or to induce an issue of notes by a promise of making deposits.

I want to call your attention to the following most suggestive and impressive statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, found in his report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1902, on page 64 et seq., because it exposes our disgraceful straits and foreshadows an overwhelming commercial disaster unless some provision is soon made:

Recent events not only justify but enforce the conclusion that our banking system is imperfect. During certain months of the year interest rates dropped dangerously low—dangerous in the sense that speculation was invited thereby. When the time arrived for moving crops, rates advanced alarmingly high. Meantime the price of Government bonds rendered the maintenance of national-bank circulation unprofitable, and this class of currency was retired with great rapidity.

The Department exerted every influence within its authority to counteract this natural contraction. During the early spring the surplus revenues were deposited with national banks upon satisfactory security, but preference was given to such institutions as maintained their limit of circulation. Then, during the months when rates of interest were low, no deposits were made. Later in the season, when it became apparent that some measure of financial stringency was certain to arise, the Department suggested to various depositary banks the wisdom of making preparation for the issuance of additional circulation. This suggestion was submitted to 18 of the larger institutions located in central reserve cities, to which 15 responded with orders for printing $12,000,000 circulation, and in the actual issuance of something over $7,000,000. Later, additional deposits were made, but they were made mostly with such banks as agreed to increase their circulation by an amount equal to and frequently double the deposit. In this way $4,000,000 more circulation was secured. Still later an offer was made to accept, as security for deposits already made, the substitution of State and certain municipal bonds at 75 per cent of their face value, in lieu of Government bonds then on deposit, on condition that the Government bonds thereby released should be made the basis of immediate circulation. In this way about $15,000,000 circulation was induced. Thus, by means of these several methods, the Department secured, in round figures, $26,000,000 increase of circulation from the national banks holding Government deposits.

During the twelve months from November 20, 1901, to November 20, 1902, 467 new banks were chartered, with a capital of over $30,000,000 and an initial circulation aggregating, in round numbers, $7,500,000, while the capital of existing national banks was increased more than $43,000,000. The increase in circulation, however, during the twelve months was only about $20,500,000. Thus it is manifest that but for the extraordinary inducements offered by the Department national-bank circulation would have contracted during the year, notwithstanding the organization of new banks and the aggregate increase in national-bank capital of about $75,000,000. In fact, national-bank circulation did decrease very nearly $5,000,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30. The efforts of the Department to increase circulation were not resorted to until after that date. Fully $50,000,000 increase could have been secured had the law permitted its rapid retirement when no longer needed.

Gentlemen, I shall include in my remarks a complete record of the increase of all kinds of money in the United States from 1892 to 1902, and trace it to the various places where it may be found from year to year, in order that those who may desire to recur to my remarks may have before them the same data from which I have drawn my inferences.

What I have said upon this subject of United States notes, silver money, the gold supply, and the issuance of bank notes under present conditions has been to demonstrate this incontrovertible truth that we have no natural relationship established between our monetary and currency supply and the demands of the people. Nor will we ever arrive at an automatic relation between deposits and reserves in gold until the burden of supplying the gold shall have been thrown upon the banks, where it belongs. Nor shall we ever establish a perfect relationship between the demands of trade and the tools to carry it on until we have a true credit-note system founded upon the commerce and trade of the country.

In this connection I desire to say that the per capita circulation of any country can not be a fixed quantity, and no man can determine how much any particular country requires. Why? Because of the very force of factors involved in making and establishing the demand for it. Wages may be low or they may be high. The people may be extravagant and spend all of their incomes. They may have a system of banking, or they may not. They may have a system of savings bank and building and loan associations, or they may not. All these factors enter into a per capita circulation. I assert that no man can say what any given country at any given time should have, so far as the per capita circulation goes. In proof of that assertion I shall include in my remarks at this point a table showing the amount of money per capita of all those nations of which I have knowledge, which ranges all the way from $1.84 in India to $37.16 in France and $48.40 per capita in the Straits Settlements.

I further include in my remarks a statement showing how much money there has been in this country from year to year from the foundation of the Government down to the present time. In 1800 we had $4.99 per capita, and at various times we have had every denomination from that up to $32 per capita.

NOTE 1.—Specie payments were suspended from January 1, 1862, to January 1, 1879. During the greater part of that period gold and silver coins were not in circulation except on the Pacific coast, where, it is estimated, the specie circulation was generally about $25,000,000. This estimated amount is the only coin included in the above statement from 1862 to 1875, inclusive.

NOTE 2.—In 1876 subsidiary silver again came into use, and is included in this statement, beginning with that year.

NOTE 3.—The coinage of standard silver dollars began in 1878, under the act of February 28, 1878.

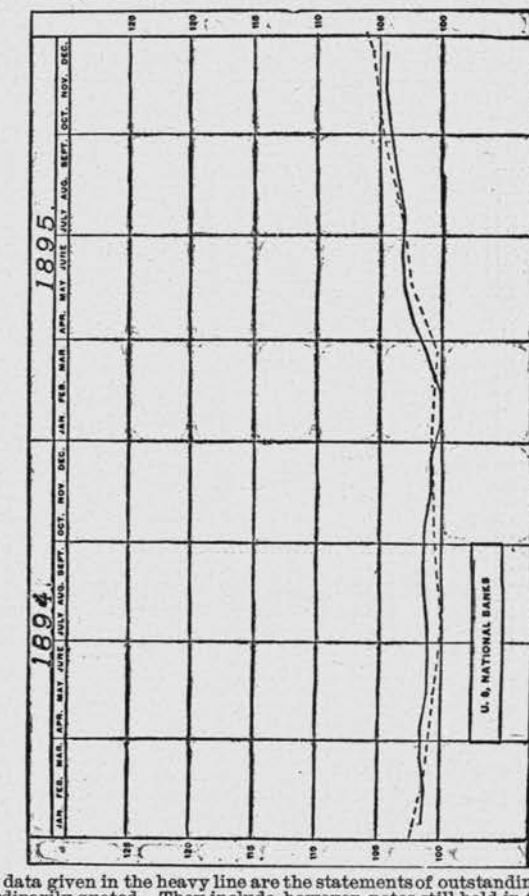
NOTE 4.—Specie payments were resumed January 1, 1879, and all gold and silver coins, as well as gold and silver bullion in the Treasury, are included in this statement from and after that date.

NOTE 5.—This table represents the circulation of the United States as shown by the revised statements of the Treasury Department for June 30 of each of the years specified.

Having gone somewhat afield to show that there was an actual need of a larger supply of both reserves and currency, and having attempted to point out that both should come from the operation of natural laws, I desire to recur to the subject-matter involved in the measure now before the committee—a true credit currency.

In the very outset I asserted that the majority of your Committee on Banking and Currency only advocated a currency which was adequately protected by proper reserves and was currently and frequently redeemed in the standard money of the country or its equivalent. Ricardo has expressed the same prerequisites in terms and words which I would if I could burn into every American mind and paste into the hat of every member of this House, where he could not forget it so long as this question remains one of discussion before this body or the people of the country.

Ricardo says:



The issuers of paper money should regulate their issues solely by the price of bullion, and never by the quantity of their paper in circulation. The quantity can never be too great or too little while it preserves the same value as the standard.

Let every member of this committtee bear in mind that as I proceed to discuss the subject of our annual fall currency panics I am keeping steadily in view this fundamental law of any sound currency system which Ricardo has so well expressed. That we have a currency panic every fall no one will deny. Is it necessary? Is there a certain and safe remedy? Let us see. I have said to you already that the United States notes were fixed at $346,000,000; that our silver was fixed at $677,000,000. The national-bank notes to-day stand at $356,000,000, which, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, but for the extraordinary use of the power in his hands in depositing or withdrawing $150,000,000 Government money, the banks would be retiring as fast as the law would permit.

Now, let us consider for a moment the only resource left for any considerable increase in our currency—that of gold. Will anyone assert that we may reasonably hope to draw from the markets of the world in a comparatively short time any gold to speak of? Their requirements are well known and their demands are steady. From July to January every year we are handling in this country somewhere between three and four billions of dollars' worth of products that are superimposed on the average business of the country. Now, will anybody say that if you add four billions to sixteen billions of dollars of products or increase the business 25 per cent it would not require additional machinery? When the springtime comes and the land is to be plowed the farmer uses his plows, and when the harvest comes the reapers are taken out and the harvest is gathered, and when the grain is stacked the thrashers are called and the grain is thrashed. Each time they put away the particular tools with which the work was done. Is it not reasonable to suppose that there ought to be additional tools with which to handle this great mass of business that is added to the average business of the year?

We have a system, gentlemen, in this country that does not respond to this enormous demand for currency because of the increased business. I will now show you how absolutely rigid and unresponsive our bank-note system is by a diagram.

You will see here a diagram which, if extended throughout the life of our national-bank system, would be repeated over and over again, as will be clearly seen by the tabulated statement for the thirteen years of 1890–1902, inclusive, which I shall submit presently to the committee.

The data given in the heavy line are the statements of outstanding circulation ordinarily quoted. They include, however, notes still held in the vaults and tills of the issuing bank; and to the extent that this amount varies at different seasons of the year this puts the circulation on a different basis from the others described, and thus yitiates comparison. Fortunately we have the required data given on the same basis as in the other systems for the five dates in each year for which reports are made to the Comptroller of the Currency. This information is platted on the diagram in the broken line, and is such as to indicate that even if we had similar figures for weekly or monthly periods, the elasticity shown would not be materially greater.

The lines might not be the same, but if there should be any vibrations in the line, which at most would be insignificant, and you should look up the bond market of that time, you would find the cause of the vibration in the prospective price of the bonds.

I was talking the other day to Mr. Rogers, the gentleman in charge of the redemption bureau of the Comptroller's office, and he asserted that he had been in that position practically from the start and that he was convinced there had been no changes in the amount of our currency, except such as resulted from speculation in bonds. The changes had borne no relation to the business of the country whatever.

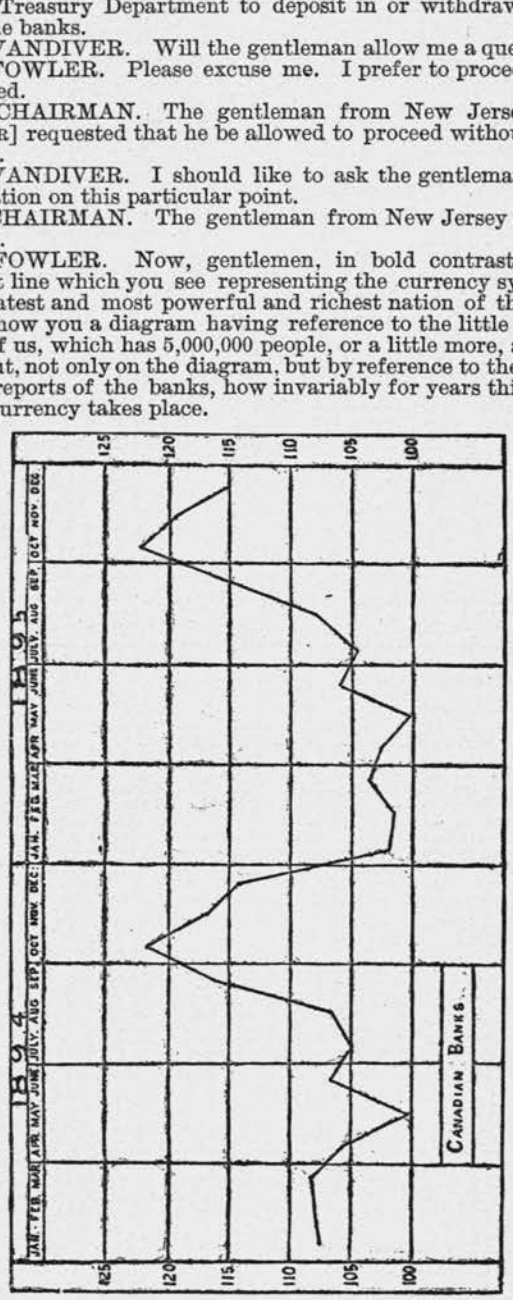
Within the last year we have felt the force of a new element in our haphazard system, if, indeed, it be a system at all—the power of the Treasury Department to deposit in or withdraw money from the banks.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?



Mr. FOWLER. Please excuse me. I prefer to proceed uninterrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] requested that he be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. VANDIVER. I should like to ask the gentleman for an explanation on this particular point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey declines to yield.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, gentlemen, in bold contrast to the straight line which you see representing the currency system of the greatest and most powerful and richest nation of the world I will show you a diagram having reference to the little country north of us, which has 5,000,000 people, or a little more, and will point out, not only on the diagram, but by reference to the figures of the reports of the banks, how invariably for years this action of the currency takes place.

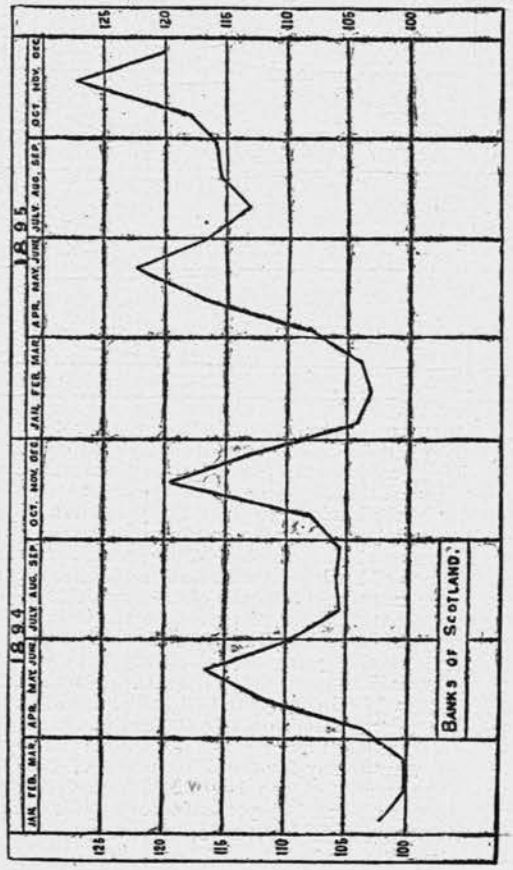
In Canada, where the people are practically all an agricultural class, every fall, when the grain is being harvested and going to the markets, the currency of the Canadian banks goes out, and then falls automatically as soon as the crops are removed.

Now, I will give you the figures for a succession of years. In January, 1897, the circulation was $30,000,000; in October, 1897, it was $41,000,000; in January, 1898, it was $35,000,000; in October it was $42,000,000; in January, 1899, it was $36,000,000; in October, $49,000,000; in January, 1900, it was $41,000,000; in October, $53,000,000; in January, 1901, it was $45,000,000; in October, $57,000,000; in January, 1902, it was $48,000,000. I have not the figures for October, 1902, but by August it was $55,000,000. The figures I have given show that as the years have gone by, as the population has increased and the business has grown, there has been a perfect recurrence of increase and decrease of the currency in Canada, the only perceptible difference being due to the increased population and increased business.



For the period since 1896 the following table gives the data as to the outstanding circulation at the end of each month. From this it will be noted that the same movement of circulation during the year still takes place, though recently on a higher general level than before 1898:

Circulation, Canadian banks, monthly from January 1, 1897.

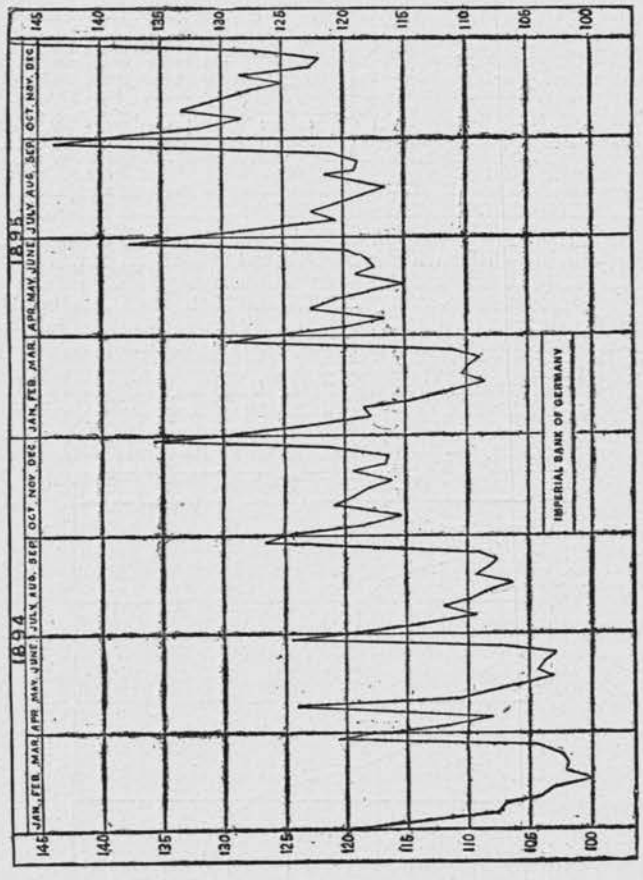
Now, there are in Canada 34 banks, and they have 747 branches extending over that country, which has about two people to the square mile, though I do not know that that statement is fair, for it takes in a very great section of country that is uninhabitable. This expansion amounts to $2.30 or $2.40 per capita every fall, and the increase disappears just as regularly as the disappearance of the crops from the market.



Now, I have called attention to the fact that in Canada there is but one season when this expansion of the currency is demanded by the business conditions. Here is a diagram which shows the amount of currency in Scotland at various seasons of the year.

In that country there are two settlement periods in the year—May and November. As regularly as May and November come out go the bank notes of Scotland to perform the work that is calling for them, and when the work is performed the notes again retire. This has gone on for two hundred years. For one hundred and forty years prior to the time when they had a single deposit in the banks of Scotland, there was simply an exchange of the notes of the banks with the farmers.

I will now refer to some figures to verify that statement. In February, when it stood at 100 per cent, there were $6,000,000 of these notes out; in June, $7,000,000. The increase had gone up from 100 per cent to 116 per cent. In December, again, or between November and December, it had gone up to 119 per cent, or $7,289,000. And so on through the recurring years you will find this same regularity in the movement of the currency of Scotland.

I have called the attention of the committee to the fact that in Scotland there are two periods in the year when there is a demand for currency. I will now call your attention to the German system, in which there are four regular periods when the currency goes out and returns. In Germany there are quarterly settlement days; and with perfect regularity the notes of the Imperial Bank go out and do the work that they are sent out to perform, which they accomplish precisely as checks do; and then return to the bank to await another summons from the demand of trade.

Now, I want to call your attention to a matter to which I am sure others may allude before this discussion is concluded, and that is the 5 per cent tax imposed by the German Government upon its note issue at a certain point. I want to say here that the statements of the bank when thoroughly understood will show that the 5 per cent tax has had no influence whatever upon the amount of the issue of these notes. The circulation went out to meet the demands of business and it went no higher after the tax was lifted by an amendment to the charter which took effect in 1901, so that while in 1899 the tax paid to the German Government on circulation reached the sum of $692,000, the highest amount of the issue that year was $336,453,220, and in the following year the tax paid amounted to $612,000, the maximum issue was $343,075,057, while in the year 1901, after the limit had been raised and the tax returned only $85,000, the highest issue was only $356,662,597 and the lowest $254,232,530. In further proof of this assertion I want to say for the information of the committee that during the year 1901 the Imperial Bank of Germany was loaning its money at 4 and 4½ per cent for months while it was paying the 5 per cent tax upon its circulation, a circumstance that was undoubtedly due to the fact that the bank was under the supervision of the Government. Therefore it is clear that the 5 per cent tax bore no relation whatever to the amount that went out nor changed or affected the time of its coming in. In a period of five years the lowest note issue was in 1898 and reached $240,000,000, and the highest was in 1902, when it was $363,000,000.

Going back to the year 1898 the amount of notes out on the 23d day of February was $240,882,504. But before the year was over, when they reached the maximum amount, they had gone to $330,000,000, or an expansion of nearly $100,000,000 in banks notes. Now, I will give you the figures for those four recurring periods of expansion and contraction. In February, 1898, the smallest amount out was $240,000,000. In March it went up to $311,000,000. In May it was $262,000,000, but in June it was up again to $308,000,000. In August it was $258,000,000 and in September it was $325,000,000. In November it was $276,000,000 and in December $330,000,000. I shall print as a part of may remarks the statements of this bank for five years, beginning with 1898, in which you will observe but one single variation of this phenomenon, and that is the increased business of Germany reflected by the increased amount of notes each year as they have gone on, but the phenomena of the exit and return of these notes four times every year always recurring.

The following information with regard to the Imperial Bank of Germany is of paramount importance to the best possible understanding of a true credit currency adapted to the modern methods of production and the extraordinary demand that is liable to be made at any time for this particular tool of commerce and trade.

I recognize the fact that so much detail is necessarily tedious, but the importance of the information more than justifies the severe test of patience its submission imposes, and therefore I am sure that I shall have your gracious indulgence while I proceed.

THE IMPERIAL BANK OF GERMANY HAS: CAPITAL, $37,500,000; SURPLUS, $10,000,000.

The limit of authorized circulation was fixed by the law of March 14, 1875, at 250,000,000 marks ($60,000,000), but the same law provided that when any existing bank of circulation should surrender its right, either by liquidation or by refusal to accept the conditions imposed by the new law, the amount of circulation might be assumed by the Imperial Bank. Seventeen banks surrendered their right to issue notes soon after the adoption of the new system, and their action added 26,085,000 marks to the authorized circulation of the Imperial Bank. This has since been increased to 42,117,000 marks authorized circulation ($69,523,846).—(From "Raffalovich, Marche Financier en 1893-94," page 67, in History of Modern Banks of Issue (fourth impression, 1902), by Conant).

The novel features of the German system of circulation is the authority given to the Imperial Bank to exceed the statutory limit of note issue without metallic security upon the payment of a tax at the rate of 5 per cent per year upon the excess of circulation.

The limit of authorized circulation was fixed by the law of June 7, 1899, at 450,000,000 marks ($107,100,000).

REPORT OF THE IMPERIAL BANK OF GERMANY FOR THE YEAR 1898.

[From the Bankers' Magazine, London, August, 1899, p. 205.]

The Imperial Bank exceeded the amount of uncovered bank notes permitted by section 9 of the bank law 16 times:

January 7, 1898	$14,736,940	October 23, 1898	$24,666,147
March 31, 1898	17,149,118	October 31, 1898	37,784,615
April 7, 1898	5,085,264	November 7, 1898	31,722,143
June 30, 1898	31,516,286	November 15, 1898	18,117,955
July 7, 1898	15,912,136	November 23, 1898	1,475,221
September 30, 1898	67,278,613	November 30, 1898	8,919,044
October 7, 1898	58,846,073	December 23, 1898	7,441,467
October 15, 1898	40,644,370	December 31, 1898	68,850,094

The duty on this excess, $468,985 (1897, $186,854), is included among the liabilities.

The note circulation of the Imperial Bank of Germany at the end of each month in 1898:

January 31	$265,430,414	July 31	$266,845,794
February 28	248,642,060	August 31	258,805,458
March 31	311,748,390	September 30	325,955,980
April 30	282,822,351	October 31	294,743,071
May 31	262,266,596	November 30	276,934,566
June 30	308,026,723	December 31	330,287,369

The circulation of notes was—

At the highest amount, 31st December	$330,287,403
At the lowest amount, 23d February	240,882,504
Average	273,641,835

REPORT OF THE IMPERIAL BANK OF GERMANY FOR THE YEAR 1899.

[From the Bankers' Magazine, London, August, 1900, p. 215.]

The Imperial Bank exceeded the amount of uncovered bank notes permitted by section 9 of bank law 20 times.

The circulation of notes was—

At the highest amount on September 30	$336,453,220
At the lowest amount on February 23	246,504,771
Average	277,816,805

The Bank of Germany publishes 4 returns a month, i. e., 48 during the year. In 20 of these returns, including the whole period from the latter half of September to the end of the year, the note circulation exceeded the legal limit, on average, $33,255,228, without any disturbance of public credit.

REPORT OF THE IMPERIAL BANK OF GERMANY FOR THE YEAR 1900.

[From the Bankers' Magazine, London, August, 1901, p. 189.]

The Imperial Bank exceeded the amount of uncovered bank notes permitted by section 9 of the bank law 20 times:

January 7, 1900	$50,863,724	October 15, 1900	$32,055,397

October 7, 1900	60,539,172	December 31, 1900	86,603,606

The duty on this excess, $612,658 (1899, $692,819), is included among the liabilities.

The note circulation of the Imperial Bank of Germany at the end of each month in 1899:

January 31	$267,579,149	July 31	$273,097,405
February 28	250,950,771	August 31	266,685,061

June 30	318,722,473	December 31	343,075,057

The circulation of notes was—

At the highest amount on December 31	$343,075,057
At the lowest amount on February 23	244,797,603
Average	277,040,355

The Bank of Germany publishes 48 returns in the year. On 20 of these returns during the year 1900, including nearly the whole period from the last return in September to the end of December, the note circulation exceeded the legal limit, on average, $29,407,515 (1899, $33,255,228), without any disturbance of public credit, the bank paying duty on this excess, $612,658 (1899, $692,919), to the imperial treasury, and without raising the rate of discount, which stood at 5 per cent the whole time.

The quiet manner in which this provision works and the low rate of interest charged assist materially in the services which the Reichsbank affords to the trade of Germany. The contrast with what would have been the position of affairs in the country had the bank act been suspended on a single occasion supplies subjects for thought which English bankers will do well to ponder over. It will be observed that the limit was exceeded during the period over which one return extends, that of September 30, by nearly fifteen millions sterling ($72,997,500), and during another, that of December 31, by more than seventeen millions ($82,730,500).

REPORT OF THE IMPERIAL BANK OF GERMANY FOR THE YEAR 1901.

[From the Bankers' Magazine, London, August, 1902, p. 179.]

The amount of the uncovered tax-free notes of the Imperial Bank permitted by section 9 of the bank law has by article 5 of the law of June 7, 1899, been raised to 450,000,000 marks ($107,100,000), and, further, on March 26 of that year was increased to 460,000,000 marks ($109,480,000) owing to the giving up of their right of issue by the Frankfort Bank. (Section 49, clause 2, of the bank law. Compare Reichs-Gesetz Blatt, p. 263).

The limit rendering the excess liable to the note tax has been exceeded five times:

January 7, 1901	$16,058,462
March 31, 1901	3,977,716
September 30, 1901	26,425,372
October 7, 1901	9,532,597
December 31, 1901	26,390,158

The duty on this excess—$85,816 (1900, $612,658)—is included among the liabilities.

The population of the German Empire in Europe is 56,000,000, so that the increase from $254,000,000 in March, 1901, to $356,000,000 in December was about $2 per capita, which is in bold contrast with our own experience, where there is no increase whatever that is traceable to the trade demands.

The following tabulated statement covering the thirteen years from 1890 to 1902, inclusive, demonstrates the utter lack of any relation between our note issues and our business demands and must convince anyone who desires to know the truth and is willing to be convinced that there is a radical defect somewhere, and that a complete remedy is to be found in the adoption of the principle of a true credit currency so forcibly and conclusively illustrated by the note issues of the Imperial Bank of Germany.

The amounts actually outstanding are given as of the end of August and December in the years named and at the end of the following April:

a February 1, 1903.

It will be seen from the above figures that in three out of the past thirteen years bank circulation actually decreased in the harvest period following August. In only three years was there as much of an increase as $10,000,000 during the harvest period. In only four was there as much as $5,000,000.

But in the first four months of the year, when harvest was over and harvest money no longer needed, all but four of the last dozen years show increase in circulation, and in only two of the four years when circulation contracted was the decrease as much as $2,000,000. In other words, the rule has been for the circulation to contract during the period of harvest needs and to expand as soon as those needs were over.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee to this next diagram as indicating what the movement of currency would be in this country if we had an elastic system that responded to trade. Instead of the straight line which we had in the first diagram which I presented, and supposing our increase of currency was in proportion to that of Canada and Germany, the line would be approximately that shown here. All of the points except the maximum point have been assumed, but consideration given to the early wheat crop in the Southwest, the summer harvest of the Middle West, and the fall harvest of the Northwest, the cotton crop, and stock sales of the fall months. The maximum point was taken from the other two tables, because we have had no such system in this country and the increase indicated would exceed somewhat $200,000,000 during the crop-moving period, that is from July to January.

Probable movement of currency if we had a true credit system.

Mr. LATIMER. What do those figures indicate?

Mr. FOWLER. Twenty per cent increase. Therefore you can readily see, if we should have this increase under normal or natural conditions, what a tremendous strain the banking machinery of the United States must be under every fall, with no power to respond and adjust itself to the vastly changed conditions growing out of the crop movement, which aggregates more than $3,000,000,000—indeed, possibly reaches the $4,000,000,000 limit. But, Mr. Chairman, we are not confined to Canada, or Germany or Scotland for illustrations of a sound credit system. We have had such systems at various times in the history of the United States, and I now desire to call the attention of the committee to several of them. The United States Bank, which was incorporated in 1816 and ran for twenty years, demonstrated the value and safety of a true credit-note system.

The capital of that bank was $35,000,000, and it could issue currency of an equal amount, and yet if you will examine the record from the time this bank was incorporated until its governmental relations ceased in 1836, you will find that the amount of circulation never at any time exceeded $23,000,000, which is absolute proof that a true credit system does not involve inflation and adjusts itself automatically to the business of the country. I shall print a statement with my remarks, and anyone reading them will find by recurring to it that the note issues were just about the same as the deposits, showing that the habits of the people then were different in this country from what they are now. What safety or protection had they? This was the penalty imposed, that if the United States Bank refused at any time to redeem any of its notes in gold or silver it was taxed 12½ per cent until those notes were paid. The result was that the United States Bank always kept an amount of coin ample to protect all of its notes outstanding.

We had in the State of Indiana also a bank known as the State Bank of Indiana, incorporated in 1834, founded upon sound principles, largely those of the United States Bank, which had a capital at one time of $2,500,000. It could issue an amount of currency double its capital. What were the requirements insuring the safety of its note issues? A 20 per cent coin reserve, and if it failed to redeem its notes in coin they were taxed 12½ per cent upon the notes so delinquent. This bank continued from 1834 to 1854, and very soon afterwards the Bank of the State of Indiana was incorporated to succeed to the rights, privileges, and good will of the State Bank of Indiana and continued until the breaking out of the civil war, when the branches of that bank were converted into national banks; and no person who ever held a bank note either of the State Bank of Indiana or of the Bank of the State of Indiana ever lost a cent because he was a note holder or because he was a depositor of either institution.

[b] Includes United States notes.

I shall include in my remarks also a statement of these banks from 1835 down to 1865; and if the members of the House shall take occasion to read my remarks I wish them to go over this statement of these banks, in which you will find that, although they could issue an amount of currency double the capital, the capital stock in 1835 was $1,199,000, but that the note circulation at the same time was only $1,500,000, and in 1840 the capital was $2,600,000, but the note issues were only $2,835,000. And so on down through the successive years. During all these years you will find by recurring to this statement that the deposits were very low indeed. Even when the notes were $4,303,000, in 1859, the deposits were only $834,000.

I want to call your attention now to a bank in the State of Ohio, founded upon the same principles and following the charter of the Bank of Indiana. A man by the name of Alfred Kelley, who had won distinction as a wise legislator in that State, proposed to the people a charter for a bank in order that they might extricate themselves from the misfortunes that had followed in the wake of the great panic of 1837. The Bank of the State of Ohio was organized in 1843. The characteristics of its charter were these: It could issue 150 per cent of currency; that is, $150,000 for every $100,000 unless the capital was very large, and then it was reduced down in some instances as low as 25 per cent upon the upper part of the capital; that is, on $2,000,000 the last hundred thousand would have less of circulation than the first one hundred thousand. The charter of this bank provided for a safety fund of 10 per cent. It also increased the reserve to 30 per cent, requiring that all of it should be equal to gold and silver coin and that at least half of it be actually in gold and silver coin. No man who ever held a note of the Bank of the State of Ohio ever lost one cent.

When the great Ohio Life and Trust Company, of Cincinnati, failed in 1857, bringing a crash all over this country, this splendid bank of the State of Ohio did not suspend. No man lost a dollar through it; while all, or nearly all, of the rest of the banks of the State of Ohio suspended, and most of them failed.

Another State of the Union, the State of Iowa, had a banking system that was founded undoubtedly upon the Ohio and Indiana charters. It went a step further, and you can find the traces of our national system in this Iowa charter. The bank legislation in Iowa was an evolution. In the first history of that State they provided that no corporation should have banking powers, and they further provided that if any man engaged in the banking business he should be fined a thousand dollars and be put in jail for one year. Subsequently under the new constitution of 1857, they provided that the people might vote upon the question of a bank charter, and when the legislature met and prepared a charter, the people voted upon that question, and the result was the incorporation of the State Bank of Iowa. It was allowed to have 30 branches.

Now, what were the principles upon which this bank was founded? First, the stockholders were to be subject to a double liability. Second, the notes were to be a first lien upon the assets of the bank. Third, they could issue notes to twice the amount of capital. The capital must be paid up in gold and silver. Fourth, they must have a safety fund of 12½ per cent in United States or State stock. Fifth, the reserve against both the notes and the deposits of this bank were to be 25 per cent in coin. So you had there an almost perfect banking charter. What was the result? No man who ever held a bank note of the State Bank of Iowa lost a dollar, nor did any depositor ever lose anything. This bank continued, Mr. Chairman, until practically all of its principles were incorporated into the national-banking system, and through its branches it passed over into the national-banking system. I shall incorporate in my remarks a statement of this model institution which was made January 2, 1865:

State Bank of Iowa, statement January 2, 1865.

Lastly, I want to call your attention to a different condition in New England from any that I have yet cited. It was a condition where, not as one bank in Ohio, one bank in Indiana, and one bank in Iowa had the issue, but where there were 300 banks in 1840, with different charters, in different States, under different conditions, and with no common supervision. These banks conducted a business upon sound principles, and just because of one single fact. That was the compulsory redemption of their notes in Boston in coin at the Suffolk Bank. Now, there were, as I have said, 300 of these banks. Forty-six of them had less than $50,000 capital, 3 of them had only $25,000 capital; and so these banks, scattered all over that country, without railroads, without any uniform law, conducted a banking business that was one of the best that the world has ever known. Their issues ran all the way from 200 per cent down to 20 per cent of the capital, according to the conditions that were imposed in the various States at various times from 1820 to 1865.

I want to call your attention now to some of the features of this wonderful system, this natural evolution of a practically perfect banking system under conditions vastly more difficult than those now prevailing throughout the United States.

In 1840, when the entire capital of the New England banks was $61,000,000 and the permissive issue was $70,000,000, the notes of the banks were only $16,000,000. In 1850, when the whole capital of the banks had reached $65,000,000 and the permissive issue was $75,000,000, the actual issue was only $31,000,000. In 1860, while the banking capital had reached $125,000,000 and the permissive issue was $131,000,000, the banks had out only $47,000,000.

Those who may desire to investigate this subject and recur to my remarks will find certain detailed statements which prove and illustrate the principle laid down by Ricardo, to which I have already alluded.

The territorial distribution of the banks is worthy of attention. They were widely scattered throughout the whole area of the six New England States and were subject to but slight supervision or control.

The following table indicates the distribution of the New England banks, according to size, about 1840:

[a] Of these 46 banks, 7 are of less than $40,000 capital, 3 of them being $25,000 or less.

The maximum limit to circulation was, in the early days of the New England banks, established by the State legislatures in the case of each individual bank and varied widely not only from State to State, but also among the different charters in the same State. The differences between charters granted in the same State had, however, for the most part, been done away with before 1840, and between 1840 and 1850 the relation between circulation and capital was fixed in the New England States as represented in the annexed table:

	Per cent of capital.

[a] Exclusive of New Hampshire.

I will not detain this committee to speak of other institutions in the United States—certain banks of Virginia, of Georgia, of North Carolina, of Missouri, and Louisiana. I might, however, allude, and I do with a degree of great satisfaction, to the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company, of which George Smith, a young Scotchman, and Alexander Mitchell, another young Scotchman, were, respectively, the president and secretary. Finding in this insurance charter a clause that allowed it to issue due bills, they began to issue its I O U's, and they continued many years doing business upon the banking principles then obtaining in Scotland, keeping a proper reserve and redeeming their notes in coin. The notes amounted at one time to $1,470,235 and traveled all over the Western country, and were known as George Smith's notes, always redeemable in coin, always good as gold, always selling at par or a premium wherever they might be found. It was simply an application of the principle I announced at the outset, a requisite reserve for a current coin redemption.

Now, what does the measure before this committee provide? It provides simply for the issue of credit currency amounting to 25 per cent of the paid-up capital of the national banks. What is the security required? We provide a 5 per cent guarantee fund in the first instance in United States bonds or United States notes or gold coin, or all combined. Next we provide that the banks shall pay each half year one-quarter of 1 per cent, or a total of one-half of 1 per cent each year, into this guarantee fund. Lastly we make the notes a first lien upon all the assets. Now, of the respective banks of issue, let me discuss for a moment or two the question of the safety of these notes.

I know that the first inquiry that will and ought to come from any member who has not studied this subject is, Are these notes safe beyond question? Let us see. Last year I asked the Comptroller of the Currency to take the national-bank system from its foundation in 1863 and eliminate every Government bond that had been deposited to secure the notes where the banks had failed, and then, making the notes a first lien upon the assets of the banks, estimate how much of a tax imposed upon all the outstanding notes would pay the notes not redeemed out of the assets. What was the result? It was estimated that if every dollar invested in Government bonds to secure the notes of the failed banks had been lost, and the notes had been a first lieu upon the assets of the bank, it would have taken a tax on all the notes outstanding of only eight one-thousandths of 1 per cent to pay the notes remaining unredeemed. In other words, this 5 per cent guaranty fund that we have proposed would last six hundred and twenty-five years, and the half per cent tax that we propose shall be paid each year will last sixty-two and one-half years. Is there any question about the safety of those notes? But it may be urged that the notes should not be a first lien. Allow me to call your attention to the tendency of legislation in this particular.

Mr. Horace White says that the first instance he discovered that notes were made a first lien on the assets of a bank was in Connecticut, where, in 1833, this distinction was made, that all notes of $100 or less should be a first lien on the assets of a bank, evidently with the view of protecting the poor. Subsequently the State of New York placed in its constitution of 1846 this clause:

> In case of the insolvency of any bank or banking institution, the bill holder thereof shall be entitled to preference in payment over all other creditors of such bank or association.

Massachusetts soon followed with the same kind of a provision. Then Iowa came, giving the note holder a first lien. Our national banking act followed the Iowa law almost without exception, including this particular feature.

Now, under the Scotch law the note holder has this advantage, that the stockholder is subject to unlimited liability if the bank was chartered under the joint stock act. The Canadian law gives the bill holder a first lien on the assets. The same rule obtains in Australasia. The reason for the prevalence of the rule is that we want a bank note that goes out to take the place of gold to be as good as gold or its equivalent. We want a bank note to perform a quasi-public function. It can not go out with an interrogation point behind it. Although it is not a legal tender, to all intents and purposes the public are morally bound to accept it; therefore it must be unquestioned.

Now, if we have such a note, the tendency is that it will remain out instead of returning to the issuer. Therefore this bill provides a system of redemption to facilitate the frequent and certain redemption of these notes. Let me say here that I am one of those who believe that currency must be redeemed as well as issued; that there is no true elasticity that does not work both ways. While the notes expand, they must also correspondingly contract, always adapting themselves naturally and automatically to the needs of the business.

Now, what is a credit note? A credit note does not differ in the slightest degree from the check of a private individual against his deposit, so far as the bank is concerned. Just follow me for a moment. If any man goes to a bank and borrows a thousand dollars, the bank loaning him the money will not care whether he deposits it and then draws checks against it or whether he asks the bank to give him a draft on a distant city, or asks the bank to certify his check, or the bank simply gives him the bank note, which is the cashier's check. They are similar in all respects, so far as the bank is concerned, differing only in this, that being used for quasi-public purposes we desire to make them safe beyond question—safe without reference to the particular bank issuing them—so that any man will take them without hesitation. They are for public use. It is for the public welfare and the public convenience that they should be safe beyond all peradventure.

Now, to impress upon you that there is not the slightest difference in principle between a deposit check, a draft, a certified check, a cashier's check, and a bank note, let me remind you that for one hundred and forty years there was no such thing in Scotland as a deposit subject to check. The banks and the public merely exchanged notes. The one, being well known, would pass freely everywhere, while the other, being very little known or absolutely unknown, had no currency value. In time the deposit system grew up, and now most of the business in Scotland is transacted by check against deposits. But in France the note system still dominates the issue, amounting to more than $800,000,000, while the deposits at the Bank of France are only about $150,000,000.

I desire to call your attention to the fact also that in the early history of this country our banks which were properly organized had note issues largely in excess of their deposits subject to check. So that it is wholly immaterial whether the credit is in the form of notes in circulation or checks in circulation. Both are forms of bank credit, only differing and made to differ because we make the bank note safe beyond peradventure on the ground of public policy.

Now, I want to add this one observation—that a bank note is the poor man's check. Every wealthy man who has a large account and doing a large business does it by a deposit in the bank and issuing checks against it, while the people of moderate means or very meager means use the bank note instead; at least this should be so. As an illustration of this you have the demand for bank notes in the fall to move the crops, pay the help, buy the provisions, and buy the clothing for the family. Therefore I say that the people who are producers of this country should have as cheap a tool of industry as the rich man, whose great account is never subjected to any burden in the form of a tax.

I have heard it urged since this bill has been under consideration in this House that these notes when once out would collect in the centers and cause speculation. Now, let me call your attention to this observation and remind you that these notes are themselves not a legal tender; they can not be used as a reserve; therefore when the banker in the commercial center receives these notes he will at once send them for redemption. Why, sir, when a man borrows for speculative purposes he never takes away gold certificates, United States notes, or silver, or bank notes; he has a credit given him, and he checks against it. No man ever carried out a financial transaction of importance in actual money. Again, if a bank in a great financial center should receive $100,000 of these notes it would not use the notes, because by cashing them it gets the legal reserve of $100,000 and can then loan four times their face value. Therefore whenever these notes come to a financial center they will be returned to the bank of issue at once for redemption.

There are those who think that there should be a 5 per cent tax imposed on these notes in order that their retirement may be insured. Now, let me ask your attention from various points of view to this question of a tax.

In the first place, the theory of the man who would impose a 5 per cent tax is that the notes would never go out until there was trouble. Sir, do you think that any banker would take the chance of paying 5 per cent on deposits, as he would be doing by paying a 5 per cent tax on these notes, while his neighbor banker could say: "That bank must be hard up, because it is paying 5 per cent on deposits?" In other words, when a bank issued a note subject to a tax of 5 per cent it would be a danger signal to every man doing business with that bank; so that, instead of being a remedy for the evil, such a system would precipitate disaster.

Again, a 5 per cent tax is nothing more nor less than a 5 per cent burden placed upon the producers of this country, for in the long run the borrower must pay the tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask unanimous consent to continue for a few minutes longer, until I have finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks consent to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FOWLER. Again, why would it retard redemption, as it necessarily would? Because if one banker received the notes of another banker which were subject to a 5 per cent tax, he would not return those notes to the issuing bank and put his own out, since he could make no profit on the notes upon which he must pay a 5 per cent tax. Therefore the very object which is sought by the imposition of a tax, namely, the return of the notes, would be defeated, from the very fact that they would not be returned, because there would be no profit to the man who held them to put out his own notes in their stead.

Now, we should have a credit currency in this country for another reason, and that a most important one. That reason is this: That when a commercial crisis approaches, we should have a currency in this country that would automatically take the place of credit subject to check. All experience shows that in times of financial danger financial disaster is averted by having a currency system that will transplant to a great degree the check system. When we have grown in business and expanded our credit we have greatly increased deposits subject to check: and whenever a crisis comes, the bank credit in the form of deposits subject to check goes down, and there is a corresponding demand for actual cash. We want a system by which we may when necessary pass at once from deposits subject to check to credit notes which will take the place of deposits subject to check.

Lastly, I want to call attention to another important fact—that a credit-note system will very perceptibly lower the interest rates throughout the United States. I do not know to what extent a perfect credit system would lower the rate of interest, but I believe that while we have an average interest rate to-day of 6 per cent throughout the United States, the average rate, with a true credit currency, would not exceed 4½ at the outside, or 5 per cent. When we enter into a contest with the rest of the world to compete for or control the markets of the world, the manufacturers and producers in the United States who are paying 6 per cent for their money are not on even terms with their competitors abroad who can get their money for 2½ and 3 per cent. And there is nothing more essential to the success of the American manufacturer and producer in the markets of the world than a lower rate of interest.

Now, what amount of note issue would this bill bring to the country? It provides for an issue of 25 per cent, which, at a maximum, would give $178,000,000. But the bill provides that all of those notes outstanding above 75 per cent of the bank capital may be retired without regard to the limit of $3,000,000 per month. Therefore there would be probably an immediate retirement of $39,000,000, bringing the maximum down to $139,451,653. I shall include in my remarks at this point a statement showing the amount of capital in central reserve cities, in reserve cities, and in the country banks, which shows that the central reserve cities of the United States have 46 per cent of their capital represented in notes, that the reserve cities have 38 per cent represented in notes, and that the country banks have 50 per cent of their capital represented in notes.

For the benefit of the members of the committee I shall add to my remarks a reprint of the bill, with such amendments in italics as the committee are going to offer at the proper time upon the reading of the bill.

Now, if there is anyone who desires to ask a question, I should be glad to answer it.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman to state to the House the number of banks of issue that are now in operation in Canada.

Mr. FOWLER. Thirty-four.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And the number in operation in Scotland.

Mr. FOWLER. Eleven.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. How many would there be in operation in this country under the gentleman's bill at the present time?

Mr. FOWLER. On November 25, 1902, there were 4,666.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. How many would be possible in the future under the bill under consideration?

Mr. FOWLER. Any bank that might organize under the national-bank act could take out notes for circulation.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman know of any country that has a banking system similar to this intended here—that is, a credit system, and which allows the circulation of gold and silver and Government notes side by side as legal-tender money—which requires that banks of issue must redeem their notes specifically in gold?

Mr. FOWLER. I want to say, by way of anticipating the gentleman's question, that the amendments which the committee shall offer provide, among other things, that the banks may redeem the notes over their own counters in lawful money and at redemption cities in the United States notes or gold coin.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman know of any country that has a system similar to this where the profit to be derived from the issue of notes accrues to the bank and the Government itself guarantees redemption of notes without any cost whatever to the bank in case the bank repudiates the payment?

Mr. FOWLER. The Government does not guarantee payment of these notes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Where the Government does guarantee payment, as practically done in this bill?

Mr. FOWLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not think the bill can be construed into anything else than a trusteeship for the fund the banks pay to the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question which refers, perhaps, to a matter of detail in administration, and which is suggested by the provisions contained in sections 10 and 11. These sections provide or designate New York, Chicago, and San Francisco as redemption cities, and set out that a bank which desires to designate New York as its redemption city shall be in that redemption district, that those redeeming in Chicago shall be in the Chicago redemption district, and so on. Then section 11 provides that if any national bank shall receive such circulating notes of any other national bank located outside of its own district, it shall not pay them out over its own counter. What I desire to inquire is, in the absence of any description here defining in a geographical way the redemption districts, how will any national bank which receives notes of another bank know the redemption district of the latter bank?

Mr. FOWLER. The Comptroller of the Currency in the first place approves of the selection of the redemption city, and when that bank receives its notes those notes will have in large figures "1," "2," and "3" printed on the face of them so that the notes will be known at sight, or there might be some other indication. That would be my suggestion, but that is a mere matter of detail.

Mr. SCOTT. And a bank in Boston, for example, may designate San Francisco as its redemption city?

Mr. FOWLER. I suppose it could select that if the Comptroller approved, but I do not think an intelligent Comptroller would approve.

Mr. SCOTT. Then it rests upon the approval of the Comptroller?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; and I think the student of what we call the credit movement would conclude that the business of the South, for instance, would naturally move to New York, that New York and all the New England banks would furnish their credit notes to the South, and then if it were found that the credits of a town out in western Ohio moved to Chicago, those banks would clear in Chicago.

Mr. SCOTT. It merely occurred to me that in the absence of a geographical division there might be some confusion.

Mr. FOWLER. That would all be under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. LACEY. I understood the gentleman to state in answer to a question from a gentleman on this side of the Chamber that the Government assumed no responsibility, that it was a mere trustee.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. Is not the gentleman mistaken in that? Section 5 provides that such notes shall be receivable for all public dues except duties on imports. If the Government has to receive these notes for internal revenue and other obligations to the Government, is there not a system of redemption absolutely?

Mr. FOWLER. Read the balance of it.

Mr. LACEY. And when so received shall be paid out again?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. But who would take them again, if they were on a broken bank?

Mr. FOWLER. Why, the guaranty fund will last six hundred and twenty-five years, and I think anybody would be willing to take them.

Mr. LACEY. I am going on the supposition now that the Government assumes no liability. If the Government receives broken bank notes and for some reason the assets should be inadequate, the Government would not exercise its power forcibly to pay these notes out again.

Mr. FOWLER. It could seize the assets.

Mr. LACEY. Consequently the Government would have to redeem them without any way of recouping itself except out of the guaranty fund.

Mr. FOWLER. First, out of the assets of the bank, of which it always takes charge upon failure, or, if the bank did not have sufficient assets, the Government would simply transfer from the guaranty fund to its own account the amount of the notes.

Mr. LACEY. But in the first instance the Government has to take the risk.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not think it would be any risk to take a note which is redeemable from a fund that, according to the experience of the national banking system, would last six hundred and twenty-five years, and especially so when the Government itself was in possession of the fund and in charge of the bank at the time of its failure.

Mr. COCHRAN. I should like to ask the gentleman one question. He stated that the issues of the provincial banks of Great Britain, so called, are convertible at the option of the note holder into gold.

Mr. FOWLER. I did not mention the provincial banks of Great Britain.

Mr. COCHRAN. So called—the Scotch banks.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, those; yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. And that is the designation of them in English writings. I believe you said that they were redeemable in gold.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will ask you if the reserves of the provincial banks, as I call them and as English writers call them, may not be kept in Bank of England notes?

Mr. FOWLER. Which are redeemable in gold.

Mr. COCHRAN. Certainly; but I ask you that question.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Then they can be redeemed in Bank of England notes.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; so long as the Bank of England redeems its notes in gold coin, and only so long. That makes them gold certificates to all intents and purposes.

Mr. COCHRAN. In other words, the Bank of England notes are available for the reserve of the other banks in England, are they not?

Mr. FOWLER. So long as the Bank of England redeems them in gold coin.

Mr. COCHRAN. And is it not true that in the economy of Great Britain, both as to legal tender and as to the bank reserves, the Bank of England note cuts precisely the figure that the greenback does in the United States?

Mr. FOWLER. I presume so, with this exception, that there the condition follows, so long as the Bank of England redeems its notes in gold coin.

Mr. COCHRAN. Is it not absolutely true that in Germany, France, Great Britain, Austria, Italy, Belgium, and Holland the issues of the imperial banks of those great countries are a legal tender for all debts?

Mr. FOWLER. The notes of the Bank of France are a legal tender so long as the bank redeems them in gold coin, but the notes of the Imperial Bank of Germany are not a legal tender.

Mr. COCHRAN. The notes of the Bank of France are a legal tender for all debts, and the court of last resort has decided that a law enabling the contracting parties to provide for any other payment is against public policy, and therefore can not be enacted.

Mr. FOWLER. But the law provides that they shall be a legal tender only so long as they are redeemed by the Bank of France in gold coin.

Mr. COCHRAN. The law of France as to legal tender is that a debt is dischargeable in the money of the country current at the time of the maturity of the debt, and it has never been otherwise from the Revolution down to this time.

Mr. FOWLER. They were only made an absolute legal tender on two occasions, from 1848 to 1850, and from 1870 down to 1878. Those were the only occasions they were ever made an absolute legal tender in the history of the bank without reference to the current redemption in coin.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. If the rate of interest to the bank were 5 per cent, or if the bank loaned the money at the rate of 5 per cent, what would be the profit to the bank issuing this currency?

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, approximately, I should say in the neighborhood of 3 per cent if the rates continued to remain at 5 per cent, but I am of the opinion that the rates would fall, so that the borrower would have the advantage of the untaxed currency and that the borrower would in the long run pay any tax that may be imposed on the circulation.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Let me ask another question. What is the profit to the banks issuing the bonded currency if loaned at 5 per cent?

Mr. FOWLER. About three-fourths of 1 per cent if all of the notes are kept out all of the time.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. What is the surplus of all the national banks of the United States?

Mr. FOWLER. I can tell you in a moment.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. In the neighborhood—just in round numbers?

Mr. FOWLER. I think it is about four hundred millions. I am not positive about that.

Mr. HILL. On the 25th of November the surplus funds were $335,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. If the banks make 3 per cent profit on this asset currency, do you not believe that they will increase the capital up to the surplus, so as to be able to issue a greater amount of currency on a greater amount of capital, in order that they may make more profit, and would not that have the effect of weakening the banks?

Mr. FOWLER. It would not have that effect. Every dollar of surplus turned into capital would increase the stockholder's liability just that much, and so increase the strength of the banks.

Mr. HAUGEN. I notice that this bill provides for a deposit of 5 per cent as a guaranty fund?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. And there is a tax of a half per cent per year, and in the event the guaranty fund falls below 3 per cent the Comptroller of the Currency may impose an extraordinary tax of 1 per cent, which will make a total of 6½ per cent interest. Do you contend part of the 6½ per cent is a guaranty for the redemption of all the outstanding notes of all the banks?

Mr. FOWLER. The bill provides that that extraordinary tax shall be returned to the bank that deposits it immediately upon its being recovered.

Mr. HAUGEN. What proportion of the 6½ per cent do you contend is the guaranty fund for the redemption of all the outstanding notes?

Mr. FOWLER. Well, if it fell to 3 per cent before they imposed the extraordinary tax there would not be 6½ per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. We will leave out the 1 per cent and make it 5½ per cent. What portion of the 5½ per cent do you contend is a guaranty for the redemption of all outstanding notes?

Mr. FOWLER. The whole fund.

Mr. HAUGEN. The whole 5½ per cent?

Mr. FOWLER. Every penny of the amount.

Mr. HAUGEN. You provide in line 7 of section 3:

If said bank shall retire said circulation or any portion thereof an amount of bonds or gold coin, or both, equal to 5 per cent of the notes so retired shall be returned to said bank.

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, when a certain bank retires its notes, the general guaranty fund has been impaired; you make it mandatory on the Comptroller to refund the total 5 per cent to any bank retiring its notes.

Mr. FOWLER. They can restore their fund, and in retiring their notes they redeem a corresponding amount of liabilities from which the guaranty fund has been made up.

Mr. HAUGEN. You do not so provide.

Mr. HILL. They are paying in full the cash before they can redeem the notes.

Mr. HAUGEN. If I take out $25,000 in notes, I can demand $25,000. Notwithstanding the fact that the guaranty fund has been impaired and reduced to only 1 per cent, you make it mandatory on the Comptroller to pay me the whole amount deposited with the Treasurer.

Mr. FOWLER. On the surrender of your notes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; on the surrender of my notes. And he must pay me out of the guaranty fund the total amount deposited, all of which is subject to my call and demand, which is true of any banker who has taken out notes.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not quite follow you in your statement.

Mr. HAUGEN. How is the 5 per cent fund to be maintained by the extraordinary tax of 1 per cent if it falls to 3 per cent?

Mr. FOWLER. By imposing a tax of 1 per cent the fund could be raised to 4 per cent that year, but could not be raised to 5 per cent until the next year, when another extraordinary tax could be imposed; but the fact is that the fund would never be below 5 per cent, as there was not one single year from 1863 down to 1902 when the tax necessary to pay the rates of the failed banks exceeded forty-eight one-thousandths of 1 per cent, or only one-tenth of the annual tax of one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. If it falls to 3 per cent, how can you refund 5 per cent?

Mr. FOWLER. Why, if you surrender your notes you are going out of this business, and if all the notes are surrendered, all the guaranty fund will disappear.

Mr. HAUGEN. It guarantees 5 per cent of the total amount paid in.

Mr. FOWLER. Of course.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question? In explanation to me a little while ago the gentleman stated that forty years' of experience had demonstrated that the loss would amount to a certain percentage, and this is a matter of security. Now, I want to know if the gentleman has taken into consideration the fact that in those forty-one years we based the circulation of $100 on an amount which was equal to $120 or $130, based on the value of the United States bonds, and also 10 per cent more on face value of bonds during a considerable period, and did it not give a security on every $100,000 of notes standing out, say, of $125,000 to $135,000, and the more circulation was out the more advantage it was to the creditors of the bank, and the circulation instead of being a liability became an actual asset, because of the surplus of security over all the issues?

Now, reversing that proposition, and instead of putting up $130 for every hundred they only put up $5 for every hundred and one-quarter of 1 per cent tax in addition to that, would not the gentleman take a different basis of computation? In other words, would forty-one years' experience, with $130 security on every hundred, be a correct basis with which to figure the next forty-one years with only 5 per cent security on each hundred dollars?

Mr. FOWLER. Now, is the gentleman through?

Mr. LACEY. Yes. I wanted the gentleman to say whether he had taken the two conflicting positions into consideration.

Mr. FOWLER. I think I will satisfy the gentleman.

According to a special report made by the Comptroller of the Currency, if all the United States bonds which were deposited with the Government from 1863 to 1901, inclusive, to secure the payment of the notes of the national banks which had failed had been lost, an average annual tax of only eight one-thousandths of 1 per cent upon the notes outstanding during that thirty-eight years would have paid all the notes of the failed banks that remained unredeemed.

Now, I think the bond proposition is pretty thoroughly annihilated when you say that they have been lost and are gone forever.

Mr. LACEY. But the gentleman is assuming that the same reason exists in national banks with $130 security for every $100 that would exist in a bank that had for every $100 only $5 security. In other words, you have placed in the new system a great temptation. Every bank about to fail will immediately inflate its currency to the utmost limit that the law will permit, while under the old system they would contract their currency because the assets back of the currency and the bonds with the premium on them exceed the circulation, and a failing bank would first get rid of the circulation. Under the new proposition the failing bank would insist on getting as much out as it possibly could. Has the gentleman taken these two conflicting positions into consideration?

Mr. FOWLER. In the first place, do you want the House to understand that the banker would be less careful in loaning his credit and loaning the deposits in his bank simply because he had some bonds deposited to secure the notes in circulation? Does the gentleman think it would make the banker more careless to have one kind of an obligation than another where both were on demand?

Mr. LACEY. Well, banks have failed in the past. A bank failed over here in Philadelphia for $13,000,000, and it only had $250,000 in circulation out. If that bank could have had circulation out on its assets, instead of failing for $13,000,000 it would have failed for $15,000,000, and possibly more. It would have gone to its utmost limit before failing, because all it had to do was to print its notes to the largest amount based on its assets.

Mr. FOWLER. How many notes would they issue?

Mr. LACEY. This bill proposes 25 per cent.

Mr. FOWLER. On what?

Mr. LACEY. On the amount of the assets or the capital.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman knows, I hope, that there is a marked distinction between capital and assets.

Mr. LACEY. Yes, I know; but I want to get at the concrete situation. Here is a bank that we have had actual experience with, and it failed for $13,000,000.

Mr. FOWLER. What was its capital?

Mr. LACEY. I do not now remember the amount of capital.

Mr. FOWLER. Do not let us get into a controversy without facts. Give us the bank, the amount of the capital, the amount of the assets, and then the issue of notes, and we will go through the whole transaction intelligently.

Mr. LACEY. Will not every bank that is in failing circumstances do its utmost to increase its circulation of notes to the limit?

Mr. FOWLER. Would not every bank try to get all the deposits it could? Every failing bank tries to do all it can to cover what is coming due. The gentleman asked whether there would be a different condition if they did not have the bonds. In the six New England States to-day I think there are 550 national banks. In 1860 there were 515 banks in the same territory.

For the twenty years prior to 1860—from 1840 to 1860—with no uniform law, with no inspection whatever, no common inspection, I mean, running over all the States, with the proprietors of the banks having the privilege of going into the back yard and printing their notes on a hand machine or writing them out by hand, what was the experience with those New England banks, of which there were just about as many as there are now? There were banks of $25,000 capital, $50,000 capital, $200,000, $300,000, or $500,000 capital. During those twenty years the tax on all the notes necessary to pay the notes of the failed banks would have been only one-eighth of 1 per cent. Now, take the national-bank system from 1863 down to last year, and the tax on all the notes, without reference to a first lien—the tax on all the notes necessary to pay the notes of the failed banks would have been twenty-two one-hundredths, or more than one-fifth of 1 per cent, proving that the Suffolk system was a sounder system in this respect than the national-bank system. Illustrations equally convincing are to be found in Ohio, Indiana, Louisiana, and the gentleman's own State.

Mr. LACEY. Then why not go back to the old State bank system, if it was so good?

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, "the old State bank system!" You are talking about a thing; I am talking about a principle which has never failed to result in a sound currency wherever invoked.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey, and his statements have been so very clear and concise that I want him to give me the very best explanation he can upon a point on which there seems to me to be a discrepancy. He stated that he considered the circulation per capita to be about $17.

Mr. FOWLER. I said now.

Mr. FLEMING. I mean now. The Treasury Department has issued a statement in which it puts the amount at $28 or $29.

Mr. FOWLER. The total amount out to-day is $32.

Mr. FLEMING. About $29, I believe.

Mr. FOWLER. I will give the exact figures in a moment.

Mr. FLEMING. The gentleman has been so very clear in all his other statements that I would like him to give, for the benefit of myself and others, the best explanation he can of that apparent discrepancy in the figures.

Mr. FOWLER. I will include in my remarks a statement of the Treasury Department showing all the accumulations of different kinds of money from 1892 down to the 30th of June last. This statement shows exactly where that money has gone and where it is to-day. Twenty-eight dollars and forty-three cents or $29, at the date given in this statement, was the amount of money in the hands of the people or in their pockets and in the banks. The money in the pockets of the people is $17.59; and when we say that we have $29 per capita in circulation it means the amount of money that is out of the United States Treasury and is in those two places—in the reserves of the banks and in use by the people.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman allow me a question? Mr. Chairman, I sought to ask a question a little while ago, but the gentleman declined to yield. I would like a little more definite information on the particular point which the gentleman was then discussing, referring to the Secretary of the Treasury having to supplement the resources of the banks or come to their relief by increasing the deposits in certain banks and by payments of Government interest in advance, the October interest, for instance, being paid in September. By methods of that kind, according to the gentleman's statement, the Government was endeavoring to relieve the stringency of the money market. Now, I should like the gentleman to give us exact information as to the extent to which that method was used.

Mr. FOWLER. I refer the gentleman to my report, in a general way, and to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury himself. I do not think I ought to take the time of the House in reading that portion of the report, but will include it in my remarks. It would take some considerable time to answer the gentleman's question in detail.

Mr. VANDIVER. I would not care for all the details; but as the gentleman has given so much attention to the subject, I was assuming that he could answer the question briefly and give us information on that important point.

Mr. FOWLER. It is a question that requires such detail of information that I think the gentleman, or any other member, by referring to the report will get the information in more satisfactory form than I could give it by my statement in a short time. It involves deposits, and asking the banks to take out circulation, and making propositions to the banks, and all that sort of thing. I do not think it proper to take the time of the House to go into those details.

Mr. VANDIVER. The newspapers during last summer and fall, in speaking of this matter that the gentleman was discussing a while ago—the necessity for more elastic currency to supply the demands of trade at particular seasons of the year—gave us the information that the Secretary of the Treasury was relieving the banks by increasing deposits at several different times and paying Government interest thirty days in advance till finally he announced that he could not or would not do so any longer. Now, I should like to know the amount of those deposits and advance interest.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not think that is exactly a question bearing on this bill.

Mr. VANDIVER. But it bears on the point that the gentleman was discussing a while ago.

Mr. FOWLER. This is only a repetition of the question the gentleman asked before, and it would involve so much explanation of details that I do not think I ought to take the time of the House in answering the question, as I have already occupied so much time.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Chairman, what I am concerned about is this: This bill provides that the Government shall have a first lien upon the assets of the bank. What I want to know is, Will not that impair the security now held by the depositors? Will not the depositors have that much less security than they have now for the payment of their claims?

Mr. FOWLER. To answer that question directly, I should say yes; but that is exactly what they have to-day when they hold Government bonds which are purchased by taking the depositor's money out of the bank after they have put it there, buying the bonds, carrying the bonds to Washington, and depositing them and securing notes. They will be in the same position then as they are to-day, identically.

Mr. LACEY. In that instance, however, they put that much of their capital beyond the reach of any defalcation in the Treasury of the United States, do they not?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; but they might convert all of the capital and deposits into gold coin, and then deposit this gold coin in a safe-deposit vault, and then they would be still safer.

Mr. LACEY. I ask my friend, because I see he has been giving the matter very much attention, if he has considered this question, whether or not the tendency of making this currency a first lien on the depositors' money would not tend to drive the deposit out of the national bank into the surety companies, where no such risks exist?

Mr. FOWLER. I think not.

Mr. LACEY. Why not?

Mr. FOWLER. Because it is a matter of accommodation. The banks would give them some facilities which they otherwise would not have. The national banks are doing a business the trust companies do not do, and it would not any more drive them out then than it does to-day, because to-day it is a first lien—not only that, but a segregated first lien, a judgment, with the execution issued, the property seized and set apart for the purpose. If there are no other questions, I shall be glad to yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER].

A bill (H. R. 16228) providing for the issue and circulation of national-bank notes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any national bank may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, take out for issue and circulation an amount of national-bank notes not exceeding 25 per cent of its paid up and unimpaired capital without depositing United States bonds with the United States Treasury in the manner provided by existing law.

SEC. 2. That said national-bank notes shall be furnished by the United States at the expense of the respective banks issuing them, and shall be in the denominations of $10 and multiples theoeof.

SEC. 3. That before any national bank shall receive any of the bank notes referred to in this act it shall first deposit in the Treasury of the United States as a guaranty of the payment thereof an amount of United States bonds or gold coin [or both], United States notes or in all equal to 5 per cent of the amount of the notes so taken out, and such deposit shall be counted as a part of the lawful reserve of said bank against said notes. The interest upon said bonds shall be paid to the bank so depositing them, and if said bank shall retire said circulation, or any portion thereof, an amount of bonds or gold coin [or both], or United States notes or in all equal to 5 per cent of the notes so retired, shall be returned to said bank: Provided, however, That if it should be necessary to sell said bonds for the purposes defined in this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to dispose of the same and use the proceeds in accordance with the provisions of law herein contained.

SEC. 4. That every national bank taking out such notes for issue and circulation shall, on the 1st days of January and July of each year, pay into the Treasury of the United States, in gold coin, a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent upon the average amount of such notes in actual circulation during the preceding six months, and the tax so paid into the Treasury shall, with the 5 per cent deposited as a guaranty for the payment of the notes, constitute a guaranty fund.

SEC. 5. That such notes shall be a first lien upon the assets of the respective banks issuing them, and shall be received upon deposit and for all purposes of debt and liability by every national bank at par and without any charge of whatsoever kind, and such notes shall be receivable for all public dues except duties on imports, and when so received shall be paid out again.

SEC. 6. That any national bank having notes outstanding in excess of 75 per cent of its paid-up capital, to secure the payment of which United States bonds have been deposited, may, upon the deposit of lawful money for the redemption of such excess, take out for circulation the notes provided for in this act, without reference to the limitation of $3,000,000 each month prescribed in section 9 of the act approved July 12, 1882.

SEC. 7. That the provisions of the law contained in section 9 of the act approved July 12, 1882, limiting the amount of notes that may be retired to $3,000,000 in any calendar month, shall not apply to the notes taken out in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That every national bank taking out such notes for issue shall maintain at all times the same reserve against such notes when in actual circulation as is now prescribed by law for deposits.

SEC. 9. That the bank notes taken out for issue in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be redeemed on demand in [gold coin] lawful money over the counter of the bank issuing them, [and] if said bank is located outside of one of the redemption cities hereinafter established, and in addition thereto it shall [then] select a national bank as its agent in a redemption city, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, which shall upon demand redeem said notes in gold coin or United States notes, or both, at its option; but every national bank which is located in a redemption city and has taken out any of such notes for issue shall redeem the same over its own counter in gold coin or United States notes, or both, at its option, and said notes shall be redeemed only as prescribed in this act. No national bank shall pay out over its own counter, or otherwise put into circulation, any of its own notes, issued in accordance with the provisions of this act, which are worn, mutilated, defaced, or otherwise rendered unfit for circulation, but may exchange the same for new notes, which shall be furnished by the United States Government in accordance with section 2 of this act. Nor shall any national bank, acting as the redemption agent of any other national bank, pay out, or otherwise put into circulation, any of the notes of such bank that are worn, mutilated, defaced, or otherwise rendered unfit for circulation, but shall return the same to the bank of issue.

SEC. 10. That for the purposes of this act New York, Chicago, and San Francisco shall be redemption cities, and all the national banks redeeming their notes at any one of these cities shall constitute a redemption district, and the New York redemption district shall be known as redemption district No. 1, the Chicago redemption district as redemption district No. 2, and the San Francisco redemption district as redemption district No. 3.

SEC. 11. That if any national bank shall receive such circulating notes of any other national bank located outside of its own district it shall not pay them out over its own counter, but shall forward them either to some bank in the district to which the notes belong, or to some bank located in the redemption city of its own district, and then they shall be returned to the bank issuing them or to some bank in the district to which the bank issuing them belongs.

SEC. 12. That upon the failure of a national bank any national-bank notes that have been taken out by it in accordance with the provisions of this act shall, upon presentation to the United States Treasury, be paid in gold coin out of the guaranty fund; but the United States Treasury shall recover from the assets of the failed bank an amount equal to its outstanding notes, and the same shall be paid into the guaranty fund.

SEC. 13. That any national bank desiring to go into liquidation shall first pay into the guaranty fund an amount of gold coin equal to the amount of its notes then outstanding.

SEC. 14. That if such fund shall, for any reason, fall below an amount equal to 3 per cent of the total amount of the bank notes taken out in accordance with the provisions of this act, the Comptroller may impose an extraordinary tax, not exceeding 1 per cent in any one year, upon the amount of the notes at the time outstanding; but such extraordinary tax shall be refunded to the respective banks whenever such repayment shall not reduce such fund below an amount equal to 5 per cent of all the notes outstanding.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BOUTELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 1027. An act granting a pension to Lavinia Cook;

H. R. 3510. An act for the relief of the executors of James P. Willett, deceased, late postmaster of the District of Columbia;

H. R. 17204. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Moors Rock, in the State of Arkansas;

H. R. 16909. An act to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Carthage, Tenn.," approved March 2, 1901.

H. R. 16522. An act granting an increase of pension to Caleb C. Van Sickell;

H. R. 16509. An act to authorize the Pearl and Leaf Rivers Railroad Company to bridge Pearl River, in the State of Mississippi.

H. R. 15595. An act confirming and ceding jurisdiction to the State of Arkansas over certain lands formerly in the Fort Smith Reservation in said State, and asserting and retaining Federal jurisdiction over certain other lands in said reservation;

H. R. 14051. An act granting the consent of Congress to N. F. Thompson and associates to erect a dam and construct power station at Muscle Shoals, Alabama; and

H. R. 4178. An act for the relief of Austin A. Yates.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3560) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes, and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes,'" approved March 2, 1893, and amended April 1, 1896, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FORAKER, Mr. MILLARD, and Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 71.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made of Penobscot River, Maine, with a view to widening the channel from Crosby Narrows to the Bangor and Brewer bridge, and also near Stearns's mill.

ISSUE AND CIRCULATION OF NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, it is conceded by all parties who have given the subject any considerable thought that there is at certain times a demand for more money, more currency, with which to transact the affairs of the nation. Some have said that there was need for more currency all the time, and those are usually persons who are opposed to the national-bank system under which we are now acting and have been with such wonderful success these forty years. Others have claimed that there is sufficient money in circulation now to transact the affairs of the nation except at some critical times in a financial stress when there is need, for a limited length of time, of more money. This is no new question. It is a question that has been considered in this country for ten or fifteen years at least, and before we determine which policy we will pursue it is well, it occurs to me, to first consider the opinions of those whom we believe to be experts upon this matter.

Secretary Shaw, Secretary Gage, Director of the Mint Roberts, and Comptroller of the Currency Ridgely are all substantially of the one opinion, if I understand their writings and sayings correctly, that there is need only for a limited time each year perhaps, or at different periods, for an amount of money greater than that which we now have. And so the question for us to determine, it seems to me, is whether we shall follow in the line of these people and their predecessors in office, who have made this subject a special study, or whether we shall adopt a policy which will inflate the currency generally in order that we may provide for the brief time when there is really need for more money to bridge over a temporary stringency in the money market. To-day we have a per capita circulation of greater amount than we have ever had in this country before. We have to-day in circulation about $30 per capita, while in 1894 we had in circulation only about $24 per capita; and I do not believe we need to increase the amount of money for the general needs of business. The extra amount should only be supplied for temporary relief when there is a stress in the money market. It seems to me it is but the part of wisdom for us to consider the opinions of men whom we know to be experts on these matters. These officials and ex-officials whom I have named, and many other prominent gentlemen, among whom I might mention my predecessor, Hon. Joseph H. Walker, a gentleman who has devoted much study to this subject and is as well posted as any other man in the country to-day, are strong advocates of what is commonly known as asset or credit currency. I wish to quote from the opinion of some of these gentlemen. Mr. Roberts, in his speech, which he made a few months ago, says:

> In times of panic the power to issue additional notes would be an element of great strength to the banks and not of weakness. It would enable the banks to protect themselves and their customers when protection is most needed. Panics or financial crises come generally very suddenly and as the result of fear which spreads among the people that they will not be able to get money to meet their payments and conduct their business. This spreads and forces liquidation of credits which otherwise would have remained outstanding. There never is a time when the liquidation of all credits or any large proportion of those outstanding is possible without producing a crisis. As long as there is confidence, and each individual feels secure that he can get what money he needs upon usual terms and security, there is no necessity for it. If our bank circulation can be made more automatically elastic, so that the banks can supply more or less of circulation as needed, which is so safe and reliable that it is readily accepted and used for all business transactions, we will have a force at work in our financial affairs which will diminish the liability of a money panic, and will be an efficient aid when we shall have an actual condition of panic.

Speaking of this asset currency, he further states:

> It is not claimed that panics may be prevented in the future by such means, but the tendency or liability to panics will be appreciably diminished if our banks have such a reserve power furnished them, and when panics occur we will be better prepared to meet them and mitigate their force and effect. This currency should be immediately and quickly available, so that the banks need not wait for serious trouble before they begin to issue it. The conditions of issue should not be such as to make it a confession or indication of weakness for a bank to issue the notes.

I have the opinions of several others which I will spread in the RECORD and not take the time now to read. They are the opinions of people whom we ought, as an important body seeking to get the best light from whatever source it may come, to respect.

The minority report states some of the objections to this bill, and I invite the attention of the members of the House to its careful consideration.

I am opposed to this bill, first, because it permits each national bank to issue two kinds of notes or bank currency, the one redeemable alone in gold, the other redeemable in greenbacks or gold. I care not if you contend that the notes which this bill permits the banks to issue are just as good or even better, if that be possible, than the present bond-secured notes. You can not escape the result that the people will differentiate between two kinds of money issued by one and the same bank. The very fact that the notes are to be considered as a different kind of money furnishes an objection to the bill, which we should seek to remedy as far as possible by making the notes redeemable practically in the same way as the bond-secured notes are now redeemed.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THAYER. I would rather wait until I get through. Then I shall be glad to answer, if I can. I do not know that I can answer any question the gentleman from Connecticut may see fit to propound; he is so proficient in all the ramifications of this subject.

Second. The practical effect of the operation of this bill will be to very materially and radically inflate the currency of the country far beyond any conservative requirement. It will increase bank circulation throughout the country nearly if not quite one-half. There is no legitimate demand for increase to such an amount. The caption of the bill is misleading and does not conform to the body of the bill. It should read, to be consistent: "A bill to extend the currency beyond the public requirements." The total amount of money in the country to-day is $2,563,266,958, and of this amount there is in national-bank-note currency $380,476,334.

We have in circulation about $30 per capita. In 1894 we had only about $24 per capita. If this bill is passed, we shall, in my opinion, have in one year more than $33 per capita in circulation, and used by whom? The poor farmers of the West we hear so much about, to move their crops between July and October? Not at all.

I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, how it will be used and who will use it. The banks having an oversupply will be anxious to put it where it will earn something, and it will go to the promoters for bolstered-up, weak, and struggling securities, new enterprises, unsubstantial projects, and uncertain and insecure enterprises. It will go where New York's money went last summer, to such an extent that in October the Secretary of the Treasury was induced to resort to questionable measures to allow banks to issue $25,000,000 of bank notes to avert a financial crisis. To be sure, the shortage came when there was a somewhat extra demand for money to move the Western crops, but this small extra demand was not the cause of the stringency in the money market.

The cause of the stringency was from another source. The small country banks had loaned their notes to the city banks in New York and Chicago months before at a small rate of interest when they had no use for them, and when they were called in as business activity in the fall created a demand for them a stringency in the money market in these great centers was experienced—not in the crop-moving localities.

Every year after the summer vacations, when business enterprises have remained dormant, trade taking a rest with those who make trade, every business enterprise takes on new life and activity, purchases begin to be made to meet the fall and winter trade, more money is required to transact the business of the country than had been required for the several months previous, and this general demand for money is still further increased by the wants of the farmers for money to move their crops.

Last fall money had been loaned out on wild-cat securities and stock-jobbing speculations to an unwarranted extent, just where it would go again if a superfluous currency were forced upon the market. Too much money invites speculation, promotes hazardous enterprises, and encourages unreliable and venturesome schemes. Wild-cat business schemes, watered-stock corporations, unsubstantial and nebulous enterprises spring up like mushrooms all over the land when money is too plentiful and interest correspondingly low.

The majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency have prepared their report with this misleading caption: "To provide en elastic currency." This is too misleading and not at all warranted by the bill itself. Anything to be elastic must not only have the ability to expand, but it must also have the ability to contract equally as well. That this bill provides for a most generous expansion of the currency no one who has carefully considered it will deny, but it is powerless to contract to any appreciable extent. It is long on expansion and short on contraction.

Let us consider for a moment what will be the practical working of a bank under this bill. Take, for example, a bank capitalized at $100,000. This bank can at once issue $25,000 in notes without any expense whatever except the payment of one-half of 1 per cent per annum taxes and 5 per cent contributed to the guaranty fund. It is not obliged to spend a dollar for United States bonds or for anything else. It should keep, of course, as it does under existing law, 15 per cent of this amount in gold to redeem the notes—6 per cent of this 15 per cent in its own vaults and 9 per cent in the redemption bank in New York or elsewhere.

The bank officials of any bank who would not avail themselves of the opportunity to issue this $25,000 in notes would be fit subjects for an asylum for idiots and the feeble minded.

Let us see what would be the next step for this bank to take. The present existing law permits any bank to withdraw its circulation to an amount equal to 25 per cent of its capitalization. The statistics show that the amount of national-bank circulation for all the 4,600 national banks in the country is only 54 per cent of their capitalization. Some, to be sure, have taken out an amount equal to their capitalization, but others have only 25 per cent out, in the whole averaging 54 per cent of their capitalization.

Now to return to this bank which we have taken as an example. It has under the present law taken out, for instance, $50,000 for circulation. Experience has shown that this is all that is required, all that is profitable, under the conditions which prevail in that locality. But having availed itself of the provisions of this bill and because it does not cost the bank anything, it has put out the $25,000 in notes and increases its circulation from $50,000 to $75,000, or 33⅓ per cent. If this bank concludes not to disturb its bonded issue, it has increased its bank circulation one-third, and I claim there is no demand for such increase in any city or town in the whole country. Suppose this bank concludes that there is no necessity for such a large circulation, what will it do? It will retire $25,000 of its bonded issue, which it can do by sending $25,000 of its bond-secured notes to the United States Treasury and receive the bonds in return.

These bonds can be sold at the present rate of 10 per cent premium on the 2 per cent bonds and about 35 per cent premium on the 4 per cent bonds. Assuming that they are all 2 per cent bonds, there will be received a premium of $2,500 in gold on the $25,000 in bonds, and this would increase the loaning powers of the bank $2,500 when it retires $25,000 of its bond-secured issue.

Thus it will be seen that banks which avail themselves of the provisions of this bill, and all banks will avail themselves of its privileges, will increase on the average their bank-note circulation one-third, providing they do not disturb their bond-secured circulation. And those banks which withdraw as much of their bond-secured note circulation as they increase it by issuing the amount they are entitled to under the bill increase their ability to loan just to the amount that United States bonds are above par.

BOSTON.

Bank.	Capitalization.	Notes.
First National Bank	$1,000,000	$50,000
Faneuil Hall National Bank	1,000,000	46,250
Merchants' National Bank	3,000,000	749,060
National Bank of Commerce	1,500,000	50,000
National Bank of the Republic	1,500,000	50,000
National Exchange Bank	1,000,000	50,000

NEW YORK.

National Shoe and Leather Bank	$1,000,000	$49,500
Phœnix National Bank	1,000,000	50,000
First National Bank	10,000,000	2,953,500
Fourth National Bank	3,000,000	50,000

The following banks have no outstanding circulation:

NEW YORK.

American Exchange National Bank	$5,000,000
Chemical National Bank	300,000
Mechanics' National Bank	2,000,000
Merchants' National Bank	2,000,000

In Boston there are 6 banks, with a capitalization of $9,000,000, which have out notes only to the amount of $246,250. In New York there are 4 banks, with a capitalization of $15,000,000, which have out notes only to the amount of $3,093,000, and 4 banks, with a capitalization of $9,300,000, which have no notes.

The 6 Boston banks availing themselves of the provisions of this bill would issue $2,250,000, when now they have only $246,250, or more than ten times as much as they now have.

The 4 New York banks would inflate the national-bank currency in the sum of $3,750,000, in place of the amount they now have out of $309,000, or more than ten times as much.

And the New York banks which have now no bank circulation whatever would put out $2,325,000.

These 14 banks in Boston and New York to which I have called attention now have a circulation of $555,550, but under this bill they can issue $8,325,000.

Mr. HILL. Why do they not take out this circulation?

Mr. THAYER. Because they can make money better and faster by not doing it. Here, then, I have attempted to show, a fair field for expansion and a good incentive for it, but is there a like opportunity for contraction after the expansion has taken place? I am assuming that the bank issue under this bill will be just as safe, just as popular, just as readily accepted as the bonded-issue notes which the banks circulate to-day. This is what the friends of the bill claim, and if it is not true, then the banks should not be given the privilege of issuing the notes at all.

We want no inferior or debased money. We have had sufficient experience with money we have had to apologize for. If the people are to question the stability or the security of these notes, are to be suspicious of them and refuse to accept them, then this legislation is both unwise and futile and dangerous to our national-bank system. But I assume and believe, otherwise I would not support any bill favoring asset currency, that these two kinds of bank notes, firm, secure, and safe, will circulate side by side upon equal terms and with equal favor, neither to the exclusion nor injury of the other, yet one is expensive for the bank to circulate, the other is inexpensive.

The notes issued under the provisions of this bill within the district where the bank is located are received by everybody, including other banks, and paid out by everybody, without let or hindrance. They have the same purchasing power, the same ability to satisfy debts and obligations of all kinds, that the bonded issue has, and, in my opinion, when not issued to a greater amount than 25 per cent of the unimpaired capitalization of the bank they are absolutely and unqualifiedly safe. If I am correct in this, tell me why these notes are any more liable to be returned to the parent bank than the bonded notes are. They are working side by side with the bonded issue and upon equal terms.

But, say the friends of the bill, "When they get outside of their own district and are received by other banks they can not again be paid out over the counter of those banks, and therefore they will be sent home to the parent bank and gold received for them, and this will cause contraction."

Not at all, or, if any, to a very small and limited extent, and to no such amount as the friends of the bill claim.

I have little sympathy with this provision of the bill. It is one of the worst of its many bad features. It seems to me to be an unnecessary, cumbersome, bungling, and uncalled-for method of redeeming a part, and that, too, a small part, of these notes; but that it can be excused on the ground that it furnished a way to force contraction I deny, and if its purpose is to force contraction, it will absolutely and completely fail in its purpose.

The great body of this issue will circulate in the district where the bank is located, and whatever portion, proportionately small as it must necessarily be, that gets away from home, outside the district, can and will be redeemed, even in the bungling manner provided for in this bill, with alacrity by the bank, and not at all to its discomfiture. There will always be sufficient idle gold in the vaults of the parent bank for this purpose, and the notes thus redeemed will again and at once be put in circulation.

The part of this issue of the bank in my city of Worcester which goes to Chicago, San Francisco, or New Orleans and is there received on deposit or otherwise by a bank in either of the three cities named can not, to be sure, be paid out by that bank again over its own counter, but may be returned to the Worcester bank, or its redemption bank in New York, for redemption.

But, Mr. Chairman, it will take no longer for a bank note to get from Worcester to one of the three cities named than it will for one of the notes of the banks in the three cities named to get to Worcester. Mr. Chairman, it must be borne in mind that all persons, companies, and corporations can receive and pay out these bank bills anywhere on earth as freely and as frequently as they choose. The prohibition to the absolutely free circulation of these bank notes is confined only to other banks located outside the district of the parent bank. Now, when these bank bills are received outside the district of the home bank, where they can not be paid out, they may be returned to the parent bank or its bank of redemption in exchange for like notes of the bank sending them, and thus the exchanges will be made between the notes of the different banks, very much like what now takes place in the clearing houses of every city, and the balance only will be paid in gold.

This will be done practically by exchanges, and the balances only will be required to be paid by the parent bank in gold, and these balances being necessarily small it will be no hardship for the parent bank to be forced to pay that balance in gold. The amount would be, as it were, a mere drop in the bucket, and no bank would hesitate to keep the notes in circulation on this account. Banks are already devising schemes by which they can get rid of the gold which accumulates in their vaults. Nobody wants gold, and nobody will take it if they can avoid it. The banks will be delighted with an opportunity to pay out the little amount of gold that will be required of them under this bill.

If I am correct in this, where does the ability for this bank issue to contract appear? I can readily see the ability for expansion once and for all in the first instance. It can not expand again, however great the demand, for it has spent its force. It is permanent and fixed, and is incapacitated and powerless to contract or to be forced to contract, as I have attempted to show.

Of what avail, then, will be the provisions of this bill in times of financial panic or when an extra or an added amount of bank circulation is required or demanded? The amount of issue under this bill will go out at once, regardless of panics or financial distress in the money market, and it will remain out and in circulation, fixed and permanent, because it is largely for the interest of the bank that it should be kept out.

If more money is required at any particular time, it can be furnished only, as it is now, by an extra issue of the old bond-secured notes. By the passage of this bill we have provided for no financial emergency, we have furnished no elastic currency; we have simply permitted an expansion of the national-bank currency to more than one-third of its present limit, as heretofore stated, and this is substantially all we have done. And we shall have done this under the pretense that we are providing an emergency currency to be used by the farmers to enable them to move their crops in the fall. Oh, farmer, in thy name what crimes are committed!

Mr. Chairman, let me not be misunderstood. I am not objecting to asset currency. On the contrary, I am in favor of it and believe it can be made safe, secure, and a benefit to both borrower and lender in the transaction of the business of the country. I am not opposed to permission being given national banks to increase their bank circulation when properly safeguarded and protected. I am only now attempting to show that this bill does not provide for an elastic currency, as the majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency claim, and furnishes no relief in a time of emergency. The very thing we are attempting is provided for.

Secretary Shaw, in an address before the Chicago Bankers' Club, December 20, 1902, said, speaking of asset currency:

> Elasticity and safety are essential. The details are not essential, provided our present system be not disturbed and the country be protected against inflation.

"Elasticity and safety," Mr. Chairman, are what the Secretary demands. Safety, in my opinion, is properly cared for in this bill, but elasticity is wanting. Expansion, one of the attributes of elasticity, has spent its force at the outset. It can not be renewed. The entire issue provided for in this bill will have gone out at the beginning. None of it will be kept in reserve because it costs little or nothing to keep it out where it is earning something. But there will be no contraction, no calling it in and placing it aside to be used when a stringency comes in the money market. If there is to be expansion and contraction the old bond-secured notes must provide it as it does to-day by the purchasing of additional bonds when extra issue is required, and by retiring the same notes when the extra damand for them has ceased.

Again, the Secretary says, "Our present system must not be disturbed." But by the provisions of this bill our present system will be disturbed, because the tendency will be strong for each bank to retire as much of its bonded issue as it pays out of the new issue, under the provisions of this bill, for each bank is the best judge as to how much bank circulation can profitably be kept out.

The purpose of the friends of this bill is in the end to change the entire system under which we are operating and permit the banks to increase the amount of asset currency to 50 or 75 per cent of their capitalization and in the end overthrowing altogether the present system. In this purpose they may be right. It is no part of my purpose at this time to acquiesce in or dissent from this purpose, but for those who agree with the Secretary I am attempting to show that this bill does disturb the present system and the ultimate purpose of its friends is entirely to overthrow the present system. This bill furnishes but the entering wedge. About 50 per cent of the present issue under existing laws is to be retired at once and the way blazed in the near future to retire all the national-bank issue under the bond system.

Secretary Shaw wants a "supplementary issue"—something that in times of emergency and financial stress will relieve the situation, whereas this bill provides not for a supplementary but a substitute for bond issue.

I am calling the attention of the members of the House to this provision of the bill and what I believe to be its practical workings, not for the purpose of antagonizing asset currency or opposing the principle, but for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that under the crude and ill-considered conditions of this bill we shall permit a substitute currency to take the place of the bonded currency, instead of providing what I feel should be provided, viz, a supplementary bank currency, to be used more particularly in times of emergency and financial distress rather than permanently to increase to any great extent the national-bank circulation notes. I believe there is nearly money enough in circulation to-day to answer all the legitimate needs of trade. Thirty dollars per capita is the largest amount of money we have ever had in this country, and it is sufficient, in my opinion, generally speaking, for the wants of the people. But there are occasions when for a limited time there is need of an extra supply. The provisions of this bill, in my opinion, utterly fail to meet that demand.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the minority or some of the minority of the Committee on Banking and Currency have presented a bill which meets their views for an elastic currency, and they ask its adoption—a bill in my opinion much to be preferred to the majority bill, and one that every member of this House who believes in asset currency can support. It differs from the majority bill in many material and vital points.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. THAYER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not mean to say that the minority members of the Banking and Currency Committee have had any bill submitted to them as minority members with that purpose in view as a minority?

Mr. THAYER. If I had meant to say that I should have said it. I said nothing of the kind. I said certain members of the minority of the committee had presented this bill.

Mr. HILL. To what bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. THAYER. To what is known as the Padgett bill.

Mr. HILL. You do not refer to the Pugsley bill or the Lewis bill?

Mr. THAYER. I do not, but to the Padgett bill.

In my opinion, this bill is much to be preferred to the majority bill, and one that every member of this House who believes in asset currency, in my opinion, can and ought to support.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THAYER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to concede that this asset currency provided for in the majority bill will be perfectly safe. If that be true, why do you want the bank to resort to a bond issue of currency, which will be more expensive, while the other would be cheaper and equally safe?

Mr. THAYER. Because these large banks in New York are availing themselves of the opportunity to do business without paying any tax for circulation, and these heavy banks, the great banks of this country, have out but very little if any circulation, and quite a number of the largest ones have none whatever. Our purpose is to compel them to place money in circulation to help you people who want a larger circulation per capita, and force them to take out one-half of their capitalization in bond-secured notes before they can get within the arena of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; but if they can furnish us with the currency that we want without going to the expense of purchasing bonds at a premium, why should we object to it? That is, why should anyone object to it who believes in banks of issue, which I do not?

Mr. THAYER. Because this is the only way we can reach these big banks. They will not now of their own free will furnish you with this currency, and we want to treat Peter and Paul alike. I presume the little banks in the city where you live have got out 75 or even 100 per cent of their capitalization in the form of bank circulation and are paying a tax on it. If they loan a part of it to a bank in New York City and want to get it back in the fall to help move the crops, they are unable to get it, because it is out skylarking. Whereas if the large banks themselves had been obliged to double their bank issues—as in some instances they would be obliged to double and in some instances to increase one hundred fold—and put the circulation out of their own banks, as was originally intended in the national-bank scheme, they would not need and they would not lock up the currency issues of these smaller banks in the country; and besides they would be paying something to the Government and be more nearly on an equal basis with smaller banks that are paying a tax on their circulation.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want it understood that I for one do not believe in banks of issue at all.

Mr. THAYER. How would you get your money, then?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would have the Government issue it.

Mr. THAYER. Then you will not vote for this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will not.

Mr. THAYER. Then I can not expect to get to your heart. I am trying to address myself to those who believe that the National Government should rid itself even of the connection which it now has with the business of issuing currency. I believe the people of this country will be glad to see the Government rid itself of that whole business.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have no doubt the banks would be glad to see the Government do so.

Mr. THAYER. Why should the banks be glad to see this done if they are now making so much money in the banking business under the present system? But what harm can come if the people are not injured in having an asset currency? If the banks, after being permitted to issue asset currency, can issue it to the borrower for about half or two-thirds the rate of interest of what they do to-day, will not the borrower in the end get the benefit of it by way of a reduction of interest charges? And thus lender and borrower alike will be benefited. I am working now, as I have been most of my life, for the under dog; and I believe if this substitute bill goes into effect, the rates of interest will be lower to the borrower. Otherwise we must consider that the bankers, all of them, are a set of scoundrels.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to state to the gentleman that I do not consider bankers a set of scoundrels, but I do consider them just as I consider people in other lines of business. They are in private business for what they can make out of it; and if you put it in their power to control the currency they will make hard times when they want to and relieve them when they want to.

Mr. THAYER. That is human nature, I confess, but on the whole the lender will ask a less rate of interest if the money costs him less.

First, the minority compels every bank before it can issue a dollar under the bill to take out and maintain in circulation 50 per cent of its bond-secured notes. The majority bill does not require them to have a dollar's worth of bond-secured notes in active circulation. The minority bill permits the banks to issue only 20 per cent of their capitalization by paying 1 per cent tax. The majority bill permits them to issue 25 per cent by paying one-half as large a tax.

Personally I prefer that the bill should provide that only 15 per cent should be issued under its provisions; but 20 per cent is to my mind much to be preferred to 25 per cent.

These two provisions are of vital importance. Under the majority bill three banks in New York, capitalized at $15,000,000, which do not to-day have any bank circulation whatever outstanding, could issue $3,750,000 of bank notes without furnishing a single bond. Under the minority bill they would have to issue and maintain $7,500,000 of bond-secured notes before they could issue a dollar's worth of notes. Under the minority bill the grand total which they could issue would be between $35,000,000 and $40,000,000 less than under the majority bill, but the bond-secured circulation would be forced up to this amount and more. As regards these two provisions is there any question which is to be preferred?

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I think the gentleman is in error as to his figures. Under the 50 per cent provision, paid in of course, they would have the 50 per cent of outstanding capital, and does the gentleman mean that they would tax it so high that it would be of no value?

Mr. THAYER. I would tax it so high that they would not issue more than is necessary. That is where our bill is better than this bill of yours. I am assuming that they would only take the 20 per cent unless there was a great, a very great, stringency in the money market and interest correspondingly high.

Mr. HILL. Do I understand the gentleman to admit that asset currency is a good thing, but if you give them permission to issue it that you ought to tax it so high that they will not issue it?

Mr. THAYER. That is the proposition, in one aspect of it; that is, I would tax the greater part of it so highly that it would not go into circulation generally, only when there was great need of the extra issue to stem the devouring tide. I would tax it so heavily that they would not put any more into circulation than is absolutely needed, and it is at this very point that this substitute bill provides for elasticity and your bill does not. You have no provision in your bill that will help out in a time of emergency, when we need money and when we are willing to give 6, 8, or 10 per cent for its use for a limited time. You have no provision in your bill compelling or even permitting banks to issue currency at such a time.

Mr. HILL. Let me understand your contention. I suppose we have authorized—the Republican side has authorized—say, 25 per cent of asset currency under certain conditions, and you claim that is inflation. On the other hand, you have authorized an issue of 50 per cent.

Mr. THAYER. No.

Mr. HILL. Am I not correct in that, Mr. PADGETT? That 50 per cent is to be issued under certain conditions, providing the bank will also issue 50 per cent on bond security in the Treasury?

Mr. THAYER. Yes; now you are getting right.

Mr. HILL. You claim that is the thing to do—to issue asset currency, and then to turn around and tax it 3, 4, or 5 per cent, so that it can not be issued.

Mr. THAYER. In order to provide that it may be issued when needed, and not at times when not needed.

Mr. HILL. Who is to be the judge?

Mr. THAYER. The banks themselves. You may determine as to what are the needs of Bridgeport. No man knows better than you how much money is needed to transact the business in Connecticut. When you put out a certain amount you will stop, but when stringent times come and you can get a large rate of interest from the borrowers you are willing to pay the Government a part of that interest for that very money, in order that you may help out your customers in this their time of distress and at the same time lose nothing yourself.

Mr. HILL. But how does that make contraction?

Mr. THAYER. When an exigency arises, when a high rate of interest can be asked, then you will pay a high rate for the privilege of circulating money, and arrange it so that when the storm is passed the money comes again to the bank, because you do not want to pay that high rate of interest except at times, and those very far off, when you can get an extra high rate of interest.

Mr. HILL. Then I understand the gentleman to mean that the tax will be added to the discount?

Mr. BURK of Pennsylvania. To help the under dog.

Mr. THAYER. Yes; the borrower will have to pay it in times of exigencies, but he will prefer to do that than to go into bankruptcy or see his all swept before him, as he too often does now.

Mr. HILL. That is the way the gentleman is proposing, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, to help the under dog.

Mr. THAYER. Well, those dogs and all the other four-footed animals of whatever name on the other side of the Chamber will take care of themselves. They have a patent on taking care of themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. THAYER. Do I understand that my time has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. HILL. I ask that the gentleman may have time to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit that request at this time. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts may be extended so that he can conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THAYER. Up to this point the bills stand upon equal footing so far as regards furnishing an elastic currency. Neither has done anything of the kind. But the minority bill by further provisions does provide for an elastic currency, while the majority bill utterly fails to meet this requirement.

The minority bill provides that when a bank issues an amount greater than 20 per cent of its paid-up capital it must pay for the next 15 per cent a tax of 1½ per cent and for the next 15 per cent a tax of 2½ per cent.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman say that there is a minority bill before the House?

Mr. THAYER. No; I do not think there is. I said that there was a bill that would be offered as a substitute.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman referred to it as a minority bill. I do not know that there is a member on this side that would vote for it.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Missouri has a bill of his own.

Mr. THAYER. How many will vote for your bill?

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not know.

Mr. THAYER. That is the trouble; we all have measures, and each one is kicking against each other rather than attempting to get together, make concessions and agree upon something practical. These taxes are so high as practically to prohibit the circulation of bank issue except in those times when money temporarily is scarce and commands a high rate of interest. At such times the banks can avail themselves of these provisions and issue 15 or even 30 per cent of their capital and thus relieve the stress and still lose nothing themselves.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman says that they will lose nothing. Will he let me put him a concrete case? A customer comes into the bank to-day and wants to borrow $50,000. The bank says no, we can not loan it to you, but we will let you have our note at 10 per cent, 5 per cent interest and 5 per cent discount.

Mr. THAYER. Oh, the gentleman is getting mixed up. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. They lend it on three months' time at 10 per cent, and five days afterwards the money comes in and they retire the notes. Under your system they have made a three months' loan at 10 per cent, and their notes have only been out five days.

Mr. THAYER. Oh, let the gentleman give that to some schoolma'am and let her figure it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I think it would be answered better than the gentleman from Massachusetts himself could answer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Here is the practical provision for expansion in times of financial depression. As soon as the exigency has passed this extra issue being circulated at the expense of high taxation will be called in and here contraction takes place. It has been said that there will be no way to call in these notes by the parent bank after they had served the purpose of relieving the financial stress, but this can easily be done by arrangements made between the banks, each to help the other in the endeavor to contract the issue by returning it to the parent bank for redemption.

Section 6 of the majority bill furnishes an inducement for banks having to-day outstanding notes in excess of 70 per cent of their capitalization to contract their bonded issue. This facility to contract is a proposition I have never heard advocated in financial circles anywhere. There is no desire to contract the bond-secured circulation unless we do away with it altogether and substitute therefor another system equally safe and secure in its application to banker and farmer alike.

It must be kept constantly in mind that we are providing for a supplementary money to be used in an emergency and in times of financial distress, and we are not providing for a substitute money or making preparations for an entire overthrow of the present banking system.

Section 7 of the bill, permitting an amount greater than $3,000,000 to be retired any month, is entirely superfluous. Practically none of this issue, under the provisions of either of these bills, will be retired any month. These notes are doing just as good service for the bank as the bond-secured notes, which cost the bank three times as much to keep in circulation. There is not sufficient inducement for it. It costs the bank too little to keep these notes in circulation for them to permit them to be retired. This is the issue the banks can make money on, and there is every inducement for them to keep it in circulation.

The Comptroller of the Currency recommends very earnestly that something be done at once to secure an expansion of the bank currency when more money is needed and when it becomes redundant that a contraction shall follow. This is no new recommendation. It has been urged for years.

The Comptroller has this plan, which he thinks will accomplish the desired purpose. He would have the law restricting the amount to only $3,000,000 per month which the banks may redeem repealed, and let the banks use their own judgment as to how much they will redeem; and he believes the banks, when permission is given them, will redeem a much larger amount when they feel that there is no demand for so much outstanding, and thus contraction must take place. And to go hand in hand with this recommendation, he suggests further that—

> If in addition to the amount of notes they (banks) are now allowed to issue by law on bonds deposited in the Treasury the national banks are allowed to issue an additional amount of uncovered notes, beginning with 20 per cent and gradually increasing to 50 per cent, it would make the circulation more elastic. A graduated tax on the amount issued, joined with ample provisions for their redemption and return to the issuing bank, would result in the necessary contraction when the circulation became redundant and the notes not needed in business. The safety of the notes can be made absolute by a reserve fund raised by a very small tax. During the almost forty years the national banking system has been in existence the total amount of the notes of the banks which have failed, outstanding at the time of their failure, has been less than $21,000,000, and during this same period the banks have paid in taxes on circulation above $90,000,000.

Of course it must be conceded that these results accrued when we were dealing with national-bank currency, every dollar of which was protected by United States bonds on deposit, but, Mr. Chairman, I contend that under the provisions of this substitute bill the bank notes issued will be as secure as are the old bond-secured notes. We have provided only for a limited amount of them to be issued—20 per cent of the capitalization of each bank. We have also provided for the same guarantee fund in bonds and the same redemption fund as is now provided for in the bond-secured note system. We have doubled the taxes for circulation and in every way necessary, in view of the experience of the past, safeguarded and protected this circulation so that it will be as safe, sound, and reliable as the bond-secured note and the public fully protected in its use.

Mr. Chairman, is there any question which of these bills is to be preferred by those who are willing to accept the system of a limited asset currency? Is there any question which furnishes and which does not furnish the most relief in times of stringency in the money market? Is there any question which bill is the more conservative and most in accordance with our present system? Which will cause the least disturbance, and incite the least criticism and fears? Which, in short, ought to be adopted, if either is adopted?

I can see but one fault to be found with this bill. It comes from Democratic sources. I fear there is a feeling here that no good can come out of Nazareth. I have been forced to this conclusion by my experience here during the last four years, and I am not entirely clear which side of the Chamber is most at fault in this matter. I have hoped that the time would come when in the legislative halls of the State and nation wise, needful, and practical legislation for the good of the whole people was proposed, the representatives who are elected to serve the whole people rather than the half which belongs to their respective parties would be willing to aid in such legislation, regardless of the source from which it came, and I call to witness those who have served with me in the different legislative bodies of my own State, and you who have suffered me to remain with you in this great deliberative body, if I have not repeatedly given evidence by my acts of the hope that is within me.

This bill is a currency bill. It is in nowise a party bill or a party measure. There is no politics in it, unless we see fit, without provocation, to inject politics into it. There is no 16 to 1 nor the dollar of the daddies in this bill. Those who sing the praises of the silver goddess and those who kneel with bared heads before the golden nugget can walk arm in arm down the center aisle of this Chamber when a division vote is being taken on the passage of this substitute bill.

Shall this grand spectacle, a union of forces and a union of parties on this banking substitute bill, be presented to the American people? [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent that the committee rise temporarily to enable me to report the general deficiency appropriation bill, so that it can be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the committee rise informally in order that he may report the general deficiency appropriation bill, so that it may be printed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Accordingly the committee rose informally, and Mr. CAPRON took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I report the deficiency appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois reports a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserves all points of order.

ISSUE AND CIRCULATION OF NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, I will not take the time of the committee to state any of the rudiments of finance, for I will not presume that you are more ignorant of them than I am. I will, however, give you what seems to me some of the reasons for currency reform at this moment.

To begin with, the present form of our national-bank circulation is objectionable, not because it is not safe, for it is safe, safe as the Government bonds, and they are as safe as the Government itself. It is objectionable because it is inadequate to the duty required of it. Because, when it is hardest pressed to do the business of the country, it is not to be had in sufficient quantity at the point where the transactions are to be made and the business is to be done.

Our present form of bank circulation presupposes a currency panic at intervals. It is inevitable under the system, and yet there are those who contemplate the prospect of a panic with indifference or in a spirit of laissez faire.

There are men who upon all other subjects are clear and fixed in their minds, yet when they are face to face with a financial proposition take council only of their fears and become hopelessly entangled in a web of technicalities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the bill which a majority of your committee has reported is one that every thoughtful man can safely support. It is not designed simply to increase the volume of currency, but to change its character, to shift the responsibility of its redemption more directly on the banks, to invest it with a resilient and homing quality that will send it to the home bank for redemption at short intervals to be retained, if not needed, and to be reissued if business activities require it.

It has been said that all forms of money are but the tools of business. If so, the banks are the tool houses whence the tools are taken out when needed and returned when not needed. When a farmer finds it necessary to send 20 men into the field to hoe corn, he would be in hard luck if he had but 10 hoes to give them. And yet after a time he would have no use for any hoes, but would return them all to the tool house.

Money is credit and credit is money. The piece of paper which bears the Government stamp of a denominated value is nothing more or less than a certified check or certificate that there is somewhere money to ultimately redeem it. With this assurance it becomes at once current for all purposes of business.

What blood is to the body money is to business.

So long as blood circulates there is life in the body.

So long as money circulates there is life in business.

When blood ceases to circulate it means death to the body.

When money ceases to circulate it means death to business.

As the business of the country is continually increasing the basis of the national-bank currency is continually decreasing.

The steady retirement of Government bonds, which gives them an additional element of safety, makes them all the more sought after as investments for trust estates, and the consequent premium which they command makes them less profitable or desirable for national-bank circulation. And so, right in the midst of prosperous times, with phenomenal crops, and all the requisite conditions for a successful business, we see the rates for money pushed up out of reach. We have seen in the last few months a financial stringency almost amounting to a panic.

We have seen the attempt of the Secretary of the Treasury to relieve the situation by depositing public money in the banks and by anticipating the purchase of Government bonds.

Now, whether bonds be purchased or whether bonds be tied up to secure deposits in the banks of Government money, it adds just so much to stringency in the bond market and practically withdraws just so much of the basis of circulation, and no actual or permanent relief is felt in the monetary situation.

However, any action of the Secretary of the Treasury at any time to relieve the money market is of questionable expediency, if not of questionable authority. The very suggestion of such an act engenders distrust and feeds public apprehension.

What about the time when the Secretary may have to call his deposits from the banks? Will this not occasion a new anxiety?

It is easy to see how an unscrupulous official might manipulate a rise and fall in the stock market.

A bond-secured currency is undoubtedly very good and very safe, but it is not as good and not as safe as the credit currency which would be issued under this bill.

It seems to me that the only questions that we have to answer in connection with this subject are, first, Is a credit currency necessary? and, second, Can it be safely issued?

The necessity for it seems to be increasing every day. Year by year more money goes to the West and the South to move the crops, and each succeeding year less money comes back. As business increases and becomes more prosperous in those sections they require more money to continue their developments.

The increase in wages which has recently taken place in the railroads, mines, and industries of this country requires in certain localities an increased volume of currency, and, unless it can be had, the burden falls upon the borrowers everywhere.

Formerly, when monthly payments of wages were made and company stores were the rule, little cash was needed.

I knew of a case where an entire family at the end of the month did not have a single penny coming to them, all their wages being taken up at the corporation store. What use was there for money in that locality?

People have been known to go through an entire year without seeing a dollar bill. But, thank Heaven, those days are gone by—and forever, I hope.

In these days of weekly or frequent payments, and in the absence of company stores, there is abundant use for money.

Money is a great educator; it teaches arithmetic, geography, and history, and it is for this reason that I have favored the adoption of our currency in the Philippines. They will by using it come to learn something of our country.

Nothing sharpens the wits like money. You may employ any foreigner, no matter how new a comer he may be, and when you pay him at the end of the week you can not cheat him out of a single cent.

It is only the very rich or the very poor who have little or no money in their pockets. The one because he does not need it, and the other because he can not get it. It is the large intermediate classes who employ the currency.

In what way may the functions of Government be invoked to protect the integrity of our currency without asking it to be responsible for its complete and ultimate redemption?

1. By fixing the limitation of the circulation to be issued by the national bank.

2. By prescribing the form and denomination of national bank bills to be issued.

3. By exacting the deposit of a guaranty fund and assuming the custody thereof.

4. By exercising a supervision over all national banks and demanding frequent reports of their condition.

Much further than this the Government can not go without trenching upon that unwritten mercantile code that governs the every day barter in trade.

Banks will not avail themselves of the opportunity to issue circulation in any form unless they are reasonably certain of a profit in doing so, and when the price of bonds becomes so high as to wipe out the profit they are sure to retire the circulation to the full amount allowed by the law, and when this is done the legitimate business of the country is sooner or later bound to suffer.

What happened in the fall of 1902 is almost sure to happen in the fall of 1903, and the situation is likely to be more strained and fraught with greater danger. It will be remarkable indeed, without some remedial legislation in this Congress, if we do not suffer great financial distress and many disasters.

While the purpose of this bill is to provide a safe form of currency in the interest of the borrower to carry on legitimate business, it can not be expected that the banks will avail themselves of the privilege and issue such a circulation unless there is some profit for them in doing it.

The essential advantage of a flexible bank-note currency is that it increases credit facilities in communities with small capital. Any form of bank credit, draft, certificate, or note, represents an order upon a banking institution in the United States for payment in lawful money.

The more easily such forms of credit can be issued the more certainly does it inure to the benefit of the borrower. The farmer and the manufacturer is assured of his money at a lower rate of interest.

The circulation to be issued under the provision of this bill will be likely to remain in the vicinity of the point of issue, and the benefits will be felt in times of panic, and the money centers and the legal country banks will be in a better position to take care of themselves and their customers by having the power to take out circulation at any moment that it is needed.

If in the panic of 1893 the banks of New York and other parts of the country had possessed the power to issue bank notes under such a provision as this, they would not have been compelled to suspend payment of checks in currency.

The power to issue notes would not only have increased the amount of currency available, but it would have enabled the banks to maintain confidence by keeping their reserves of lawful money intact or unincumbered.

The ability to issue credit notes would relieve the pressure of a panic in another way. By giving to the country banks an increased power of issue it would enable them to husband their cash reserves and would greatly diminish their drafts upon New York and other reserve cities for legal-tender money.

Thus the New York banks would be aided not only by their own power of issue, but by relief from the withdrawal of reserve deposits, which is always so serious a menace in times of panic or monetary pressure.

This relief would, perhaps, be more important in some respects than the ability of the city banks themselves to issue notes, and the net result of all these resources would be much greater elasticity in the banking system for meeting emergencies of every nature.

But it is when we are seeking foreign markets for the products of our labor that we most feel the need of a credit currency. It is when we have to compete with the low rental value of money in foreign markets that we are at the greatest disadvantage.

With such a system as is provided in this bill we could establish and maintain a credit center in this country and not be compelled to draw our bills of exchange on London in all our business transactions throughout the world.

A bill of exchange on London is regarded as the best in the world. It is the fault of our banking system, and it is not greatly to our credit that a bill of exchange on New York is not as good as a bill drawn on London.

A low money rental means a large volume of business the world over.

Under this bill banks would make their money by charging low rate on a large volume of money rather than by charging high rate on a small volume of currency, and everybody would be benefited.

It will be observed that the volume or amount of the bank clearings or checks and transfers of book accounts adjusts itself to the volume or amount of the sales and purchases of each day, month, or other term of customary credit granted and received. The one amount in the settlement in the clearing house is the symbol of the other. The liquidation in terms of money can not be separated from the traffic in the goods or other property any more than a shadow can be separated from the substance by which it is thrown upon the ground. The objective point of all legislation in respect to the issue of bank notes which are to be passed from hand to hand in the payment of wages or for the purchase of small parcels should be directed toward a similar adjustment of means to ends—that is, to make provision so that these small instruments of exchange shall correspond in number, volume, or amount to the work which they are to do. They should adjust themselves automatically to the payment of wages, the moving of crops, and the small transactions of life in exactly the same way that the clearing-house transactions in liquidation of wholesale work adjust themselves automatically to the conditions of each day, each month, or each season.

If there were no statutes limiting the issue of bank notes, and if the Government did not undertake to assure the redemption of such notes on demand, the notes would circulate on the credit of the banks of issue and the volume would become adjusted to the exact measure of their use. Under modern conditions—the supervision of clearing houses, the quick spread of information, and the exact knowledge of credits—the public would be protected by the solvency of banks and bankers, and there would be no legislative problem such as is now pending. But the Government has not only taken upon itself the manufacture of coined money, certifying by its stamp the weight and quality of each coin, but it has also assumed the duty of assuring the redemption in coin made of gold of all the small notes or instruments of exchange, whether issued by the Government or by banks of issue. In other words, the Government has assumed the functions of a bank of issue, for which it is totally unfit. The actual problem of legislation, therefore, is how to divest the Government of this unfit function, and also how to assure the redemption of bank notes, and at the same time to enable banks to issue notes in such number, amount, and volume as will meet the varying demands of trade. This is a very simple problem. At the present moment the conditions are as follows:

First. An enormous production of real capital—by "real capital" meaning a production of metals, food, timber, and fabrics—beyond the immediate needs of the people for the support of life, the additional capital being available for the construction of new works of every kind to meet the increasing demands of the population.

Second. We have a well-established banking system, ample for the conduct of what has been called the wholesale exchange and capable of expanding on that line in exact proportion to the requirements of the nation, but utterly incapable of supplying an adequate circulation of small notes.

Third. We are under a restricted or inelastic system of providing small notes for the payment of wages or for the purchase of goods for cash over the counter.

The conditions may be compared to that of a great railway system for which all the plans had been perfected; the rails, materials for bridges and buildings assembled where needed; the workmen waiting to do the work, but the whole work is stopped because of an insufficient supply of wheelbarrows and tipcarts at the right places.

The analogy between the railway and the bank is very close. Railways are the common carriers of the food, fuel, fibers, and fabrics which are necessary to existence. I am informed by one of our most distinguished statisticians that in the year 1901 14 tons (28,000 pounds) of these materials were hauled 142 miles over some railroad for every man, woman, and child of the population. These materials consisted of grain, meat, cotton, wool, timber, iron, coal, and all fabrics. The average charge to each person for this service was $13.79, or a fraction less than a dollar a ton for hauling 142 miles.

As these goods were passing from producer to consumer the banks and bankers were also the common carriers of the titles of or instruments of credit secured by these goods.

They were passing the checks, drafts, bills of exchange, and book accounts representing the goods, while the goods themselves were passing over the railways throughout the land. When these goods reach their final destination and are in the process of distribution in small parcels, the bank note becomes the instrument by which the title passes. The amount and number of these bank notes must adjust themselves to the volume of trade. No statute can prescribe a limit any more than the number of wheelbarrows and tipcarts required at a particular point in the construction of a railway could be fixed by statute.

It is a fact of common knowledge, which has received but little attention in this discussion, that the losses by bad debts of banks, trust companies, merchants, and traders do not amount in an average year or even in a year of panic or commercial crisis to a quarter of 1 per cent, or to 25 cents on each hundred dollars of credit granted and received. If the Government itself should offer to guarantee the prompt payment at maturity of the obligations of all debtors to their creditors at a quarter of 1 per cent, the business community as a whole could not afford to take it, because their aggregate losses by bad debts are much less. Sir Henry Sumner Mayne rightly observes that in the modern conduct of commerce almost wholly upon credit of longer or shorter date

"The trust reposed in and deserved by the many makes the opportunity for the fraud of the few."

Perhaps one of the most remarkable developments to contemplate in our industrial history as we pass from the old to the new century is the relative position of our agricultural and manufactured products. A study of the census discloses a remarkable relation of our manufactured to agricultural products.

Prior to the census of 1890 there had been no question whatever as to the supremacy of agriculture. The census of 1890 showed that the total value of products of agriculture, including live stock on farms, amounted to $3,289,000,000. The gross value of the products of manufacture were returned at the same census as $9,972,000,000. It is fair to deduct from this amount the value of all materials consumed in 1890, whether raw or partially manufactured. After doing this there remains $4,210,000,000 of manufactured products which may be called the value added to the raw materials by the several processes of manufacture.

This shows an excess of about $1,000,000,000 of manufacture over agriculture. So it will be seen that thirteen years ago agriculture had fallen to second place in this country.

These differences have continued to widen, and the census of 1900 shows a gross value of agriculture products of $4,740,000,000 and of manufactures in net value of $8,370,000,000, or nearly twice that of agriculture.

It must be remembered that all of the raw products consumed in manufactures are not agricultural products. The census of 1900 shows that of raw materials consumed in manufactures agriculture supplied $1,940,727,000 in value, or 81.2 per cent.

The mines supplied $319,975,000, or 13.4 per cent in value, and the forests $118,803,000, or 5 per cent of the total. The oceans, lakes, and rivers supplied $9,635,000, or four-tenths of 1 per cent.

It will be seen by these figures that the manufactures of this country are forging ahead, and it is not too much to predict that the next census will find the manufactured products three times greater in value than the agricultural products.

Wonderful as this statement may seem, it affords no reason for jealousy or enmity between these two great departments of industry. It is inevitable that it should be so, and makes it absolutely a necessity for us to seek out all possible markets for our products wherever they may be found throughout the world.

At the present time the nations of Europe which are the strongest competitors of the United States in the markets of the world are passing through a period of severe commercial depression.

In order to provide employment for their workmen and create a market for surplus products, every effort is being made to secure foreign orders which in the ordinary course of trade would be placed in the United States.

That this policy will certainly result in diminishing our export trade in manufactured articles is evidenced by the fact that orders for machinery and other articles of a like character now required by South Africa are being placed in England and Germany.

Recent trade reports state that some American manufacturers are building factories abroad with the view of taking advantage of cheaper materials, to hold the trade which they have already built up in neutral markets.

We must not shut our eyes to the fact that under normal conditions the productive capacity of the United States far exceeds the consuming power. Nor can we shut our eyes to the fact that the present prosperous conditions can not continue with a diminished export trade. Unless our export trade keeps pace with our trade in domestic markets we are bound sooner or later to pass through the same commercial depression as Europe is now experiencing. I believe that this can in a large part, if not entirely, be averted by amending our banking laws as provided in this bill, and by giving our manufacturers the utmost possible freedom from tariff exactions when competing in the markets of the world.

But these figures are chiefly valuable in connection with this question as showing the great need of a flexible and obtainable currency at all times and in all places where business is to be done.

If we would continue the development of our country and the endurance of prosperity, we must provide for some form of currency more flexible and better adapted to the varying conditions of trade at different times and sections.

There is an alternative. We can arrest the development of the country; we can curtail the products of our manufactures; we can stop building railroads; we can cultivate less acres; we can mine less coal and less minerals; we can cut down our foreign trade and shut ourselves out from the world; we can cut down wages everywhere, and possibly then we can get along with the present currency.

This might give us relief, but it would be the relief which comes with death. Is it possible that there is anyone who seeks this form of relief?

Does anyone delude himself with the belief that a pinch will not be felt when another autumn comes with its demands for currency to move the crops?

Can anyone rise up here and propose any remedy for the situation which will be lawful and at the same time safer and more scientific than a carefully guarded credit-currency measure?

There are some, doubtless, who will say: "Oh, let this go on, and when the worst comes to the worst let the banks issue clearing-house certificates, and, if need be, legalize such an issue."

Well, my friends, this is as if a man should wait until it got so cold that he would set fire to his house to get warm.

If the issue of clearing-house certificates were legalized and made possible, how long think you it would be before it would become the rule and not the exception to do this? My impression is that it would be more difficult to properly safeguard such an issue than it would be a credit currency. Moreover, its benefits would be confined to the large money centers and would not meet the varied necessities of the country banks and country borrowers.

The issue of bank notes to-day is so difficult and expensive that it works as a discrimination in favor of the money centers and against the agricultural districts.

The means of doing business in the large cities, where there are plenty of banking facilities, makes the use of the check system one of the great facilities, and the result is that bankers are somewhat indifferent to the benefits to be derived from a flexible bank-note system.

Banking facilities in the agricultural districts are so wide apart that it is not easy to employ the check system to advantage. The bank note, which is nothing more than the printed certified check, would be of great use to such communities.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the necessity for a credit currency. Now, can it be safely issued?

This, it seems to me, is purely a question of mathematics, and it can be demonstrated beyond contradiction that a credit currency can be safely issued under this bill.

By the great law of averages, which is the foundation and saving principle of life and fire insurance companies, and by the experience in Canada, Scotland, and the United States, the exact liability is perfectly measureable.

It is shown that an annual tax of a fraction of 1 per cent, amounting in the case of the present national banking system of the United States, during its entire history, good and bad, to about one-fifteenth of 1 per cent per annum, would more than meet all the losses upon the notes of failed banks not covered by their assets.

I desire to submit a statement showing the ratio of demands upon the safety fund indicated by the history of the national banking system from 1864 to 1901:

Ratio of demand upon safety fund indicated by history of the national banking system, 1864–1901.

Total outstanding issues of failed banks at the time of failure, 1864–October 31, 1901	$23,559,915
Annual average of this amount for thirty-seven years	$636,754
Percentage of liabilities to assets	.75
Annual average thus applied to note issues	$477,564
Net loss on notes	$5,889,978
Annual average net loss on notes	$159,188
Total collections under the tax upon circulation to October 31, 1901, at 1 per cent to March 14, 1900, one-half of 1 per cent in certain cases since that date	$88,786,089
Average annual taxes collected	$2,399,624
Excess of average annual taxes above losses if notes had shares ratably with other assets	$2,240,436
Excess of total taxes collected above losses	$82,896,111

Taxes collected more than 15 times the indicated demands upon the safety fund.

It will be seen by this statement that the question of safety of the circulation provided by this bill is secured beyond a peradventure by the annual tax without the encroaching upon the 5 per cent guaranty fund.

It is the consensus of opinion among all the financial students that the risk attending a properly safeguarded credit currency is reduced to a minimum.

It is true that there are not wanting some men who lived in the times of the State banks and the issue of an unguarded circulation who have not grown with the country and are incapable of appreciating the needs of business. These men may be found to-day standing like scarecrows by the roadside shouting, "Wild-cat currency!" They are often the same men who at one time favored an irredeemable fiat money, or at another time contended for the free coinage of silver. They are not the people who have made a study of our business necessities. They are not the people who have kept pace with or in any way contributed to the development of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one who believes that there is only one road to Jerusalem, that there is only one way to Heaven, or that there is only one correct plan for currency reform.

Six men sitting down separately to draw bills might each draw a perfectly sound and workable measure, either of which this House might with safety adopt, provided they all recognized the fundamental principles of necessity and safety.

In the last Congress I introduced a bill, which was reported from the committee, providing for an issue of 10 per cent of the capital stock of a national bank in credit currency. It was in essence and principle the same as the present bill. It provided for two funds, a redemption fund of 5 per cent in lawful money to currently redeem bank notes through the agency of the subtreasury, and a guaranty fund of 5 per cent lawful money to pay the bills of failed banks. Both of these funds were deposited and maintained in the Treasury of the United States.

The bill provided that after three years a further issue of 20 per cent, and after six years a still further issue of 40 per cent, of the capital stock of said bank might be made. I have all confidence that this bill would be absolutely safe, practicable, and remedial.

I have equal confidence that this present bill will be as safe, as practicable, and more immediately remedial than my bill, because it carries a 25 per cent issue at once instead of a 10 per cent issue.

It is gratifying to see that the minority of the committee have introduced a bill which has the essentials of a sound credit currency measure, and which, were it not that the majority bill is so much better, would with a few amendments be entitled to receive the support of this House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I know he does not desire to mislead the ocmmittee. The gentleman said something about a minority bill.

Mr. LOVERING. The only bill I have seen which could be referred to by the report signed by the minority of the committee has been the Padgett bill. Has the gentleman himself a bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. That was not the purpose of my interruption. The gentleman does not desire to mislead anyone, and it would be misleading to the House and to the public to say that the minority is in favor of the Padgett bill. Mr. PADGETT is a member of the committee and a member of the minority, and has introduced a bill, but there is not a word said by the minority in the report about the Padgett bill or any other bill.

Mr. LOVERING. I do not want to offend the gentleman by using the word "minority."

Mr. BARTLETT. It is no offense; I only wanted to correct the gentleman.

Mr. LOVERING. The report is signed by five members of the committee, and is in favor of a credit currency.

Mr. BARTLETT. A majority of the minority members may be in favor of it.

Mr. LOVERING. A large majority. To my mind the most important feature of the bill is the provision that is made for the redemption of bank notes. This is the backbone of the measure. It supplements and reenforces every other section. It contributes to the safety of the currency issued. It makes it an easy matter to examine and report upon the condition of banks.

It supplies the contracting quality necessary to elasticity, and without which there can be no elasticity. For this reason, if for no other, this is the strongest bill that has yet been presented to this House.

Mr. Chairman, speaking as a practical business man, I feel absolutely sure that so far as the issuing of a commercial or credit currency is concerned it can be done with absolute safety under this bill, and I think that the advantages that will accrue to the business of the country can not be overstated. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OVERSTREET having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 18, 1903:

H. R. 1014. An act granting an increase of pension to Laura Levenseler;

H. R. 2614. An act granting a pension to John Sullivan;

ISSUE AND CIRCULATION OF NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about the bill and the substitute of the minority of the committee. I wish to say in behalf of the minority, once for all, that their report speaks for itself. We have agreed upon no bill, no substitute. We did say that we would favor an asset currency if properly issued, properly protected, and properly taxed. We have gone no further than to say that. We have further said, and we reported, that we did not favor the bill now under consideration, known as the "Fowler bill."

It has ever been obnoxious to me to feel that the Government must depend upon any association or banking institution for the issue of money; but I have investigated the practice of the countries of the world, and I have found that all first-class governments depend to a certain extent for currency upon the different banking institutions.

The Democratic party have had in their platform a declaration for State bank currency. My own State, which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, has on its statute books a law declaring for a State-bank currency and asking for the repeal of the 10 per cent tax on the State banks of issue.

I am free to say that I would vote for the repeal of that 10 per cent tax at the very first opportunity. I should be glad to see the State banks of issue once more in existence. On the other hand, I am frank to say that with 45 States having different kinds of bank currency I should have grave fears that some of the States would have too liberal and probably weak laws in giving banks the privilege to issue currency, and thereby casting reflection upon the banks of the States having better laws.

But I am glad that this question is being discussed and discussed here in Congress. For the last ten or a dozen years the press of the country, the different boards of trade, and the people generally have been discussing the question of asset, elastic, and emergency bank currency. But the difference on this question is widespread. None have come to a conclusion as to what would be a proper currency or a proper system. Therefore, the minority of the committee have said that they would be willing to assent to an asset currency properly issued, properly protected, and properly taxed. Of course it is understood by the members of the House and the country that under the existing law all national banks are permitted to issue bank-note currency in amount equal to the capital of the bank, or to the extent of the par value of United States bonds deposited by the bank with the Treasury of the United States.

This bill does not permit the national banks to issue a greater amount of currency than the system under which national banks now operate, but it provides that every national bank may issue asset currency to the extent of 25 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital without depositing bonds as security therefor, the assets of the bank and the double liability of stockholders of the banks being the security, the banks paying one-quarter of 1 per cent semiannually as a tax on this issue.

I am opposed to this, the Fowler bill, for several reasons. First, it confers a special privilege upon the banks. Without indorsing the views of our Populist brethren, I have always loved their motto—"Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." Sir, I am opposed to this Government granting special privileges to any individual or any corporation.

Second, the banks, under the operation of this bill, will decrease their bonded circulation in preference to their asset circulation.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me a question right here?

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I ask it not for the purpose of interruption, for I want to say that I appreciate the fairness and honesty and integrity of purpose with which my friend from Georgia has approached this question. But I wish to ask him what harm could possibly be done by decreasing the bond-secured currency and substituting for it, under a fixed limit, an asset currency if this currency is cheaper and better for the country than the bond-secured currency?

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. I am glad to answer the gentleman's question, which is the same question he asked of one of my colleagues of the committee. I want to say that I believe in a liberal amount of currency; and while I have never espoused the cause of the national-bank currency, I honestly concede that the bond-secured circulation is the soundest currency we can have. We have five securities for that currency: First, the Government is behind it; second, we have the security of the Government bonds; third, the redemption fund put up by all the national banks of the country; fourth, to secure that currency there is a first lien on the assets of the banks; and fifth, there is the double liability of the stockholders of every bank. Therefore we want that currency; but the banks should be denied the right of retiring the bond-secured currency, which is not very profitable to them, and issuing instead an asset currency, which, though good, is, in my opinion, the weaker of the two forms of money, but very much more profitable to the banks.

It is a safe currency, apart from the question whether it is otherwise a desirable currency; and if asset currency is to be issued, I would demand that every bank should take out 50 per cent of the bond-secured currency before it could have the privilege of issuing this asset currency. The chairman of the committee stated this morning, in answer to a question of mine, that the profit on the bonded currency to the banks amounted to only three-fourths of 1 per cent, while the profit on the asset currency would amount to about 3 per cent.

I am opposed to any bank issuing this asset currency until it has first done its duty and taken out a certain amount of bonded currency. I want to keep the bonded currency that we have now on hand. It amounts to about $5 per capita. I want to keep it, because it is the safest money—safer than asset currency, because for the asset currency you have only the security of the assets of the bank and the double liability of the stockholders. Therefore, I say, whatever may be the security for the asset currency it is not so good as a bond-secured circulation.

Fourth, I object to this bill because the banks should pay a greater tax to the Government for the privilege of this issue than is proposed in this bill. The banks in all countries pay their respective governments for such a privilege.

A great deal has been said here to-day about taxing this asset currency. It is proper it should be taxed. The Government should get some benefit from it. Under the Fowler bill the Government gets no benefit from the taxation of this money; it all goes to building up the redemption fund in the Treasury, which is for the benefit of the banks. I believe it ought to be taxed to make it the elastic and flexible currency of the country, and to make it remain out at issue as long as the trade and commerce of the country demand it and are willing to pay the interest. When the demand or stringency has passed, and it is no longer profitable to the banks to keep this currency in circulation, then they could and would retire it. In my opinion, this is the kind of asset currency the country is asking for.

I beg to read here some remarks of Secretary Shaw in respect to what he says about taxing this money. He says:

How shall retirement be secured? I recognize that some careful students of the subject think that this will regulate itself when given free play and that the lower the rate of tax the more certainly it will retire. This would, perhaps, be true if our entire system were unified upon that plan. I am not so certain if the present system, which must not be disturbed, is to be supplemented by the allowance of a limited issue available only in times of stringency. If the issue were a billion, 5 per cent retirement would mean a fifty million contraction. But if the issue be limited to from fifty to one hundred million, 5 per cent retirement would not signify much. A reasonably high rate will certainly afford a strong inducement for the banks to retire their circulation when not actually needed. What that rate shall be is a question for very careful, not scientific, but practical investigation.

I will use two extreme illustrations. If the banks were paying only one eighth of 1 per cent tax on circulation, they would not voluntarily retire so long as it could be loaned at all. Other banks might send it in for redemption, but it would be reissued with equal promptness. But if the tax were 2 or 3 per cent and if the banks were required to maintain a reasonable reserve against it, they would certainly retire rather than loan even at 4 per cent. They would, however, reissue whenever interest rates advanced to the point of profit. A stringency would bring it forth, and in the locality where most needed.

Mr. HILL. Will not the gentleman admit that the Secretary is speaking of an entirely different kind of redemption? He is speaking of redemption through the United States Treasury, whereas the Fowler bill proposes a redemption through the banks themselves, taking the Government entirely out of the business. They could do that in redemption through the United States Treasury, but you can not do it with the banks making their own redemptions.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. But does not the gentleman know that the bank making 3 per cent profit on asset currency would keep that currency out at all times?

Mr. HILL. I know is is absolutely impossible for the bank to put out currency unless there is a legitimate demand for it of some kind somewhere.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. That is the point I am making. The banks would keep the asset currency out and would retire the bond currency. Yes; the banks should be required to issue 50 per cent of bond currency before they have this special privilege, and when this privilege is granted they should be made to pay a tax of at least 2 per cent on this asset circulation. There has been something said about what the banks are doing in the way of circulation. We find the average circulation of the national banks all over the United States to be 54 per cent, but on investigation it will be found that the smaller national banks of the country are coming to the rescue of the currency and doing their duty, and not the larger city banks.

Mr. FOWLER. Just a moment. The records from the Treasury Department show that the country banks have 50 per cent of their capital represented in notes, and the banks of the central reserve cities have 46 per cent. There is not very much difference.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. I have made a tabulated statement of twenty of the largest banks in the three largest cities—New York, Chicago, and Boston. I find that eleven banks in New York City have a total capital of $62,000,000 and a circulation of $24,000,000, or 38 per cent. I find that five of the largest banks in Chicago have a total capital of $18,000,000, and that they have a circulation of only $1,545,000, or only 11 per cent as compared with their capital. Four of the large banks in Boston have a capital of $9,500,000, and they have out in circulation only 4 per cent as compared with their capital. Therefore the total percentage of the circulation as compared with the capital of these twenty banks I find to be 31 per cent.

I find some of the large banks of the country have not taken out any circulation at all. Now, would it be right to permit them to come in and take out this profitable asset circulation and thus reap the benefit? Let me illustrate. One of the largest banks in the United States, the National City Bank of New York, has a capital of $25,000,000. They have a bonded circulation of only $5,000,000, or 20 per cent, as compared with their capital. Would it be fair to let this bank come in under this bill and get the benefit of this asset currency? They could issue $6,250,000 of this asset currency, it being 25 per cent of its capital, upon which to operate. Why would they not take it out? What does it cost them?

They could issue this currency, paying at the rate of a half of 1 per cent tax or interest, whatever you may term it. Certainly, they would take out asset currency and probably decrease their bonded currency. Let us see what we would be doing for that one bank alone. At the rate of 3 per cent, which the chairman of the committee states these banks would derive, that bank would make on this $6,250,000 of asset currency a profit of $187,000. In other words, the Government is giving them $187,000 of profit by reason of this special privilege.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman stated a moment ago that he was in favor of the repeal of the 10 per cent State bank tax, which, in the State of Georgia, would give his bank the privilege of issuing 100 per cent of asset currency.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes. Why does the gentleman object to the national bank issuing 25 per cent if the State bank he is in favor of could issue 100 per cent.

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. I do not say that I am in favor of that. I say there is a law. I do not know the amount that it permits the banks to issue. I say and maintain that State banks should issue only a reasonable amount as compared with the capital and it should pay a tax for that privilege. There is where we differ. Instead of the banks issuing this bonded currency, they are using their bonds to secure deposits. The National City Bank of New York, to which I was alluding when interrupted, while taking out only $5,000,000 of currency as against a capital of $25,000,000, has on deposit of Government money to-day $17,000,000.

That is what banks prefer to use bonds for—to get this deposit money. It is more profitable to them, because by depositing bonds with the Treasury of the United States they get the use of this vast amount of Government money free of all interest.

Permit me to allude further to a transaction of the Government with this same bank. We all remember the sale by the Government of the custom-house property in the city of New York to the National City Bank, in which peculiar transaction the Government is called upon to appropriate annually $130,600 as a rental, and under the peculiar terms of the contract between the Government and the bank at the expiration of the full term of the contract, which has five years yet to run, the Government will have completely paid the purchase price of the property and $100,000 in addition, and the National City Bank will have the property at no cost whatever to itself. I desire to read a statement relative to this strange transaction that appeared in the New York World of February 2:

CITY BANK GETS ANOTHER $130,600—ANNUAL CONTRIBUTION FOR RENT OF BUILDING BOUGHT BUT NOT PAID FOR.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1903.

The United States Government's annual contribution of $130,600 to the National City Bank of New York appears in the sundry civil appropriation bill reported to the House to-day. With the present payment the Government will have paid to the National City Bank $653,000 for rent for the old custom-house property, which the bank bought of the Government for $3,265,000.

At the expiration of the full term of the contract between the bank and the Government, which has five years yet to run, the Government will have completely paid the purchase price of the property and $100,000 in addition, and the National City Bank will have the property practically at no cost whatever to itself.

When the National City Bank bought the old custom-house property it agreed to pay the Government $3,265,000 for it. In reality the bank never paid a cent, although in August, 1899, it did notify the Secretary of the Treasury that it had deposited with itself to the credit of the United States $3,215,000. The Government never called in this money, but permitted it to remain in the bank, which is a Government depository.

ARRANGED THROUGH MR. GAGE.

It is frankly admitted by the National City Bank that it still owes $50,000 of the purchase price. This jugglery was done through Secretary Gage and the bank officials, so that the title to the property would still rest with the Government, and the bank would not be obliged to pay about $75,000 a year in taxes to the city of New York. It was one of the best and most scientific methods of tax-dodging then invented. During the five years that the Government has been donating $130,600 a year to the bank, the bank has saved about $375,000 in taxes.

In addition to the rental the bank gets it also receives interest from the Government on the United States Government bonds which it deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury to be allowed to hold its purchase money as a Government deposit, at the rate of 4 per cent a year.

At the expiration of five years, half the term of the contract, the account stands:

Paid National City Bank in rental for five years, at $130,600	$653,000
Paid interest on Government bonds, at 4 per cent, to secure Government deposits	653,000
Saved National City Bank in taxes	375,000
Total	1,681,000

The contract is to run five years longer, when $3,362,000 will have been paid into the bank by the Government for a property which the National City Bank bought for $3,265,000.

HAS HAD UNITED STATES FUNDS.

In addition to all this, the National City Bank has had the use of Government moneys, which have always been of a greater sum than $4,000,000. This money is lent by the bank at whatever rate of nterest it can get.

Of course, Congress will make the appropriation for the rent.

As matters now stand, in ten years the National City Bank will have the old custom-house property and will have received from the Government or been saved through nonpayment of taxes $3,365,000. For this all that it did was to write a check and notify the Secretary of the Treasury that $3,215,000 was on deposit in the National City Bank to the credit of the United States.

I desire to show further the close relation that exists between the Treasury Department and some of the large banks of the country, which is so advantageous to these banks. For that purpose I give herewith a statement of the United States deposits with five large banks in New York City, which are generally recognized by all as the Rockefeller or Standard Oil and J. P. Morgan & Co. banks:

Name of bank.	United States deposits.
First National Bank of New York	$2,678,000
National Bank of Commerce, New York	2,692,000
National Park Bank of New York	3,000,000
Hanover National Bank of New York	5,211,000
National City Bank of New York	17,089,128
Total	30,670,128

You will see from this statement that the combined deposits of the United States Treasury with these five banks amounts to more than $30,000,000, for which the banks are paying no interest and at the same time lending at the ruling rates of interest.

It is for these reasons that I look with suspicion on all legislation pertaining to circulation and the banks. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that too much has already been done for the banks and we are yet asking for more favors for them. Let us look to a system that will not confer too many favors on the banking corporations, but rather let us devise a system of deposits and a plan of circulation that will promote the welfare of all lines of commerce and the good of the country at large.

We to-day have nearly $30 per capita circulation. Whether this is as much money as is good for the welfare and hearty condition of our country I am unable to say. At times it may be and at other times it would not answer our purposes. At any rate, I am inclined always to the side of a most liberal circulation of good and safe money. I want to say to my friends on this side of the House, let us condemn the currency system and our Treasury plans that now exist. The Republican party on March 14, 1900, passed their currency bill. They said, "Our currency system has been put in good condition, we are all right; now we can go before the country and praise its perfection."

I want to say that to-day we are having as much or more trouble with the currency than we had at that time. And about the best thing they did was to make the national banks more popular by making them more useful to the wants of trade and adapted more generally to all parts of the country. We opposed their currency plan then; and I say let us stand together ready to condemn its weaknesses and inconveniences now. Why, the idea of the Government keeping $150,000,000 in gold locked up in the Treasury of the United States. What for? For the purpose of redeeming our United States notes. If you will investigate the condition of the Treasury on the 20th day of February, 1903, statement of which I insert in my speech, you will find that they have only $6,000,000 of United States notes on hand, while they have $150,000,000 gold the reserve fund to protect that $6,000,000.

The circulation statement issued by the Treasury Department, February 1, 1903, which I present, shows that the general stock of gold in the United States on that date was $1,246,876,715, while the total stock of United States notes is and has been all the time $346,681,016, it being a fixed amount, while gold is increasing all the while. Now, with this large amount of gold in the country, certainly an amount ample to take care of all the United States notes at any and all times, it is absurd and impractical for the Government to keep locked up and out of the channels of trade, from the wants of the country, and preventing it from performing its duty as a circulating medium, the $150,000,000 in gold, held there for the purpose of redeeming these notes.

It is true that in 1893 these notes, then standing at same amount as now, did cause a demand and strain on the Treasury for gold redemption, thereby producing what is commonly known as the "endless chain;" but the great increase in the production of gold in the last ten years makes it improbable and unreasonable to even suspect that the condition of 1893 would possibly occur again. Then we say the present system is bungling and ought to be condemned. Let us ask and insist—yes, demand—that it be corrected on proper and common-sense lines.

A condition confronts us. Therefore let us face it and adjust it as best we can.

They tell us we have not enough bonds; that the national banks can not get the bonds upon which to issue their bonded currency. Upon investigation I find a bond-secured circulation of about $384,000,000, while the total national-bank capital is $715,000,000. Our interest-bearing bonded indebtedness amounts to $931,000,000, consisting of 2 per cent bonds, $445,000,000, and in 4 per cent and other rates of interest bonds, $486,000,000. Or, we have $216,000,000 more bonds than the total national banking capital, and we have $547,0000,000 more bonds than the total bank-note circulation. In addition to that, we will soon have the Panama Canal bonds for the purposes of bank circulation.

While I am not advocating national banks, I say they are growing more popular in the country than they ever have been. I find that since the act of March 14, 1900, to October 31, 1902, the number of national banks organized was 1,212, and out of that number the South organized 307 and the great State of Texas 153, as appears from the table given below.

Organizations by classes, States, and geographical divisions during the period named are shown in the following table:

This shows that these banks are becoming more popular, and, as I say, when we have a condition confronting us let us meet it. The banks are here, and here to stay, most of them strong, under our system; then let us manage and control these banks and make them come to the rescue of the country in issuing currency and pay a proper tax to the Government for the privilege we grant them. Let us make them rather the servants of the people and the servants of the country than masters of the situation.

I can not advocate any measure that simply looks to the profit of the bank and not to the interest of the people. With three-quarters of 1 per cent profit to the banks on bonded circulation, I do not think it is harmful, and I am anxious to see that bonded circulation increased, certainly not diminished. We must bear in mind that our money is all fixed. The amount of silver we have is fixed. The amount of bank notes we have is fixed. Our only way of increasing the money of the country is by what gold we may produce or acquire by advantageous exchanges with other countries. Consequently I believe we need a currency for circulation, as I have said, properly issued, protected, and taxed.

I believe such a currency would prove of benefit to my own section of country, the South, at our crop-moving season, when, on account of a stringency of money, we can not always rely on the great money centers for assistance. At such a time and in such an emergency the local banks, under some system of elastic currency, could come to the rescue and supply the need of temporary increase in the volume of money frequently needed in moving our large cotton crop. When the emergency had passed, that currency should be retired.

Such a currency would likewise prove beneficial to the West in moving its enormous grain crops, and to all sections of our common country where circumstances and conditions are such as to occasion, in times of money stringency, the temporary need of an increase in the volume of existing currency.

Mr. Chairman, before I close my speech I must insist that the Government should have its banks of depository more equitably distributed over every section of our country. I believe it would be a wise policy to permit all national banks in the United States to become depositories and entitled to their respective shares of the Government's surplus money, in proportion to the amount of circulation they issue under the privileges extended them by some plan of elastic emergency currency, and I would require the banks to pay interest on every dollar so deposited. If that plan were in existence to-day the Government would be getting a revenue from its deposits in the national banks, and instead of the deposits being largely confined to certain favored banks in certain favored sections this money would be wisely and justly distributed where the entire commerce of the country would receive the direct benefits that would flow from it.

I would be glad to see all surplus moneys not wanted in the Treasury deposited with these banks, but above all, Mr. Chairman, I would rather see our burdensome taxes reduced and the needless accumulation of money in the Treasury, which is and has been going on for some time, stopped.

By our present relations of Government to banks we have added great wealth to the national banks of the country, and by our unholy and unnatural system of tariff taxation not only have we taken from the tax-ridden public what was not needed, but we have builded up great and powerful "trusts," which in turn are controlling many of the largest banking institutions of the country.

Then let us at once change our system of finances and taxation, reduce the taxes, and let the money remain where it rightfully belongs—in the channels of legitimate business and in circulation among the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, we have now under consideration the bill H. R. 16228, which is for the purpose of providing for the issue and circulation of national-bank notes. Perhaps it would be well for the committee to consider just what kind of money we now have in our country.

Gold coin, standard silver dollars, subsidiary silver, minor coins, United States notes, and Treasury notes of 1890 have the legal-tender quality as follows: Gold coin is legal tender for its nominal value when not below the limit of tolerance in weight; when below that limit it is legal tender in proportion to its weight. Standard silver dollars and Treasury notes of 1890 are legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. Subsidiary silver is legal tender to the extent of $10, minor coins to the extent of 25 cents, and United States notes for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. Gold certificates, silver certificates, and national-bank notes are nonlegal-tender money. Both kinds of certificates, however, are receivable for all public dues, and national-bank notes are receivable for all public dues except duties on imports, and may be paid out for all public dues except interest on the public debt.

This bill adds another kind of money to the money that we now have in circulation and will be either legal tender or nonlegal tender. Now, let us see what this kind of a currency will be. Section 5 provides:

That such notes shall be a first lien upon the assets of the respective banks issuing them, and shall be received upon deposit and for all purposes of debt and liability by every national bank at par and without any charge of whatsoever kind, and such notes shall be receivable for all public dues except duties on imports, and when so received shall be paid out again.

In other words, these notes, if issued under the provisions of this bill, will be very similar to the present national-bank notes and will be nonlegal tender. Now, perhaps it may be said by some of our friends in this committee, Will these notes be good and will they be as universally used throughout the entire country as our present national-bank notes? To my mind, and from my reading and study of this question, I am convinced that these notes will be good; that they are abundantly secured under the provisions of this bill. But perhaps the committee may say: "That may be your opinion, but you may not have knowledge sufficient to give to this committee upon which they should also base their opinion and agree with you upon this question." Now, let me for the benefit of the committee read the opinion of one who ought to know something upon this question. I read from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1902, on page 66:

I see no objection to the issuance of circulation based upon general credits, if properly safeguarded. (Neither do I believe it necessary to make currency thus issued a first lien upon assets.) A very small tax upon circulation would be sufficient to cover any possible loss. The Government actuary has demonstrated that a tax of one-eighth of 1 per cent upon circulation would have covered all loss from the beginning of our national-banking system to the present time, had each bank maintained its limit of circulation. Instead of calling this a tax, suppose it be called "premium on insurance" and the Government the "underwriter." The banks could be required to redeem their circulation at reserve cities, and the Government would never suffer injury or embarrassment as an insurer against ultimate loss. The lowest tax suggested by anyone would far exceed any possible loss, and the Government could assume responsibility to the people and still realize a profit.

When thus guaranteed and primarily redeemed by the Government at the expense of the bank of issue, currency based on general assets would be as acceptable and as secure as the present national-bank notes based on specific assets.

I doubt, however, the wisdom of making provision for the issuance of credit currency to the limit of the bank's capital. Not that I would fear unfortunate results, but in all financial legislation the greatest caution must be exercised lest the currency be suddenly and unduly inflated. An elastic currency is well-nigh imperative, but a sudden, unnecessary, and permanent increase would be most unfortunate.

Authority to issue circulation based on credits would not preclude the continuance of the present national-bank currency. Neither is it necessary that it be designated "credit currency." If all forms of money were made interchangeable, what some are pleased to call "asset currency," others "credit currency," and still others "emergency currency" might be denominated "gold-reserve currency," for certainly a reserve against this class of currency should be maintained by the bank, and this reserve would be very properly gold, should the Government make all its money interchangeable.

So much for the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now let us see the report of our friends who are on the minority of this committee. On page 3 of their report I find this:

If it is the purpose and policy of the bill to get away from the present system of a bond-secured currency and substitute in its stead a credit currency, then the legislation providing for it should be comprehensive in its scope and particular in its details, and should be so framed as to furnish a currency sufficient in volume to meet the demands and necessities of the legitimate business of the country.

We are of opinion that many of the banks, finding the circulation authorized under this bill so much more profitable than the currency authorized under existing laws, will be inclined, as far as possible, to use the currency provided under this bill and refrain from issuing currency under the provisions of existing laws, and seek to force the currency issued under the provisions of this bill to do the business of the country.

We would cheerfully support a bill measuring up to the standard above indicated, which would be calculated to remedy the evils of the present currency system, but we are unwilling to assent to the passage of a bill such as H. R. 16228, which, in our opinion, fails to afford relief and will only produce confusion in our monetary affairs.

The views of the minority agree with us, in the main, that is, as to the mode of procedure as to the question at issue, whether it is wise or unwise for us at this time to proceed along the line of a credit currency, along the line of asset currency, along the line of emergency currency, along the line of a currency convertible into gold, or a gold currency. That is really what this bill is. This is a measure asking for the issuance of a bill which over the counters of the issuing banks is convertible into gold, exchangeable into gold, and at the reserve cities, within the limits of where they are placed, they can be exchanged for gold. Then we have in circulation a currency that our friends on the other side by their report seem to concede that there is no harm in the passage of a measure looking toward this end. But they differ with us as to the mode of procedure, and to listen to my friend from Massachusetts in his discussion he seemed to be of the same opinion, but he doubted the wisdom of the working plan of this bill. We upon the other side believe in the working plan of this bill. We believe it will carry out the purposes that we have in view, namely, taking a step toward getting away from the bond-based currency we now have.

Now what have we? We have a national-bank system, and in order to get the right of circulation they have to purchase a certain number of bonds. They have got to go into the market and buy the bonds. The bonds upon which their circulation is based are largely a 2 per cent bond, selling, say, at 108. Then, if they desire to issue circulation, say, of $100,000, each bank would have to go into the market and pay $108,000 to issue a circulation of $100,000. But that $108,000 is locked up, and they are receiving in consideration therefor 2 per cent, and they then take $100,000 from that $108,000 and there are $8,000 locked up, not in circulation. They receive the $100,000 and they receive interest at the rate of 2 per cent on the remainder.

What is the effect upon the business interests of the country? Just exactly as it is occurring in my own city, just exactly as it is occurring in Illinois and all the States of the Union, men are going out of the national banking system and going into the trust system. They are going into private banks of the State. Why? Because they will take the hundred thousand dollars and lend it to their neighbors and get 5 or 6 or 7 per cent a year, and not have to take $108,000 in order to get into the banking business.

Mr. HILL. And they are not compelled to maintain any reserve.

Mr. PRINCE. And, as the gentleman from Connecticut says, they are not compelled to maintain a 25 per cent reserve in the large places and 15 per cent in the smaller. There is no reserve whatever, and they go into the trust banks to the exclusion of the other, and contract the currency of the country as rapidly as they can, bringing it down, because they are forbidden to exceed $3,000,000 monthly. This is not compulsory; this measure confers on the banks an opportunity to go along in that line. In other words, they march along side by side with the bond-based currency. If they do not wish to take advantage of it, well and good. If they do wish to take advantage of it, well and good. If the business interests of this country do not believe it is a safe currency, they can not put it into circulation. If the business men and the people who use this money, either in trade or commerce, will not accept it for the payment of debts, if they have any doubt that it is good, they will refuse to accept it, and the banks will have to go out of existence; and at the rate of 25 per cent of paid-up capital it can work no great harm to the country at all. Why? Because it is amply secured. The Secretary of the Treasury so states.

The report of the gentlemen on the other side make no claim that it is wildcat; they make no claim that it is red dog; they make no claim that it is that class of money that you will have to take a counterfeit detector along with you—that old book that they used in the time of the old-fashioned State banks. There is no such charge made against the bill; no such charge can be truthfully made against it. It may be in the nature of a departure, but it is a step in the direction of getting the Government out of the banking business. It is a step of departure from the bond-based currency, and as the time approaches we will have to move out in some direction or other. There is no question about it. We are paying for bonds as fast as we can get them. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has gone into the market and paid a premium in order to get bonds.

I do not want to touch upon political matters in these remarks, but I want to say that the Government is only an aggregation of individuals. The Government is receiving more money to-day than it is paying out; it is on a sound financial basis. In the days before the party to which I belong took possession of the Government the receipts of the Government were not enough to meet the daily expenses, and the gold reserve run down and there was a financial depression all over the country and it was called a banker's panic; but call it by what name you please, it came and we felt the effects of it. To-day there is more money coming in than we are paying out. We have been piling up the surplus, and to-day there is more than $220,000,000 available to the credit of the Government. One hundred and fifty million dollars of gold reserve, fifty millions more than we had in other days, $220,000,000 of available cash that the Government can use, and yet by reason of these bonds being put at a future date for payment, they can not reach them to-day unless they pay a premium.

Now, the purpose of this bill is to get away from the bond question. You will remember that when Mr. Harrison was President the question was then urged, What shall we base our national-bank system upon? He was paying off the debt as rapidly as could be done. We have been paying it off ever since March 4, 1897, as rapidly as it can be done. The indebtedness to-day is less than it was before the Spanish war, with all the accumulation that has been placed upon us by that war. We are rapidly paying of this debt. These bonds are being used by trust companies, guardians, executors, conservators, and trustees; they are putting their money into these bonds for the purpose of protection. It is a question of some importance to men who want to enter into the national-banking business, as to whether they can get the bonds with which to issue currency. Why should the Government bonds be a subject of speculation in the markets of this country? Why should we put our bonds in that shape? For one I am in favor of moving along other lines—along the lines of this credit currency—because I believe it is safe and just and right, as affecting the interests of the people of the country.

But my good friend on the other side has suggested (if I may digress a little at this point) that we ought to get some interest on this money. Well, I wish we could. I have never believed as a citizen that a school trustee should use the public money by loaning it and then appropriating to his own use the interest upon it. I have never believed that a county treasurer should so use the people's money that the interest may come into his hands. I have never believed that a State treasurer should so deal with the public money as to realize a personal advantage to himself by the loaning of the funds and appropriating to his own use the interest realized upon said loans. It is public money. I do not believe that we ought to put the money of the Government in pet banks anywhere and allow them to have the use of it without giving the Government any interest or advantage in some form.

I wish to see some kind of measure presented and passed which would secure to the Government such benefit. But I am free to say that it is better for the people's money to be in the people's banks, where the people can get it, than to have it locked up and nobody getting any benefit from it. It would be better in the pockets of the people than locked up here in the Government vaults at Washington. But there are $150,000,000 that have been put out in this way, and it is better that it should be so disposed of than that we should be issuing bonds to get gold with which to pay the expenses of the Government.

But let us go a little further in the consideration of this measure. Let me read from the bill. The first provision is that—

Any national bank may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, take out for issue and circulation an amount of national-bank notes not exceeding 25 per cent of its paid up and unimpaired capital without depositing United States bonds with the United States Treasury in the manner provided by existing law.

Does that comport with the idea of the Secretary of the Treasury? Certainly. I doubt, however, the wisdom of making provision for the issuance of credit currency to the limit of the bank's capital. This provides for an issue not exceeding 25 per cent of the "paid up and unimpaired capital" of the bank.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman was referring a few moments ago to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Was that the report of Secretary Shaw?

Mr. PRINCE. I think so. Yes, sir; the report of the Secretary of the Treasury dated December 2, 1902.

Mr. BARTLETT. It sounded very much like the language of Secretary Gage.

Mr. PRINCE. Well, Secretary Gage is a very clever man and a very learned man on the subject of finance.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not mean to say that he was not; I simply said that what the gentleman read sounded very much like the language of Secretary Gage.

Mr. PRINCE. One of these gentlemen lives in Illinois and the other in the neighboring State of Iowa. Both gentlemen have been in a position to know a great deal on this subject. I say that the bill comports with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. Let me further read from the bill:

SEC. 3. That before any national bank shall receive any of the bank notes referred to in this act it shall first deposit in the Treasury of the United States as a guaranty of the payment thereof an amount of United States bonds or gold coin, or both, equal to 5 per cent of the amount of the notes so taken out, and such deposit shall be counted as a part of the lawful reserve of said bank against said notes. The interest upon said bonds shall be paid to the bank so depositing them, and if said bank shall retire said circulation, or any portion thereof, an amount of bonds or gold coin, or both, equal to 5 per cent of the notes so retired shall be returned to said bank.

In addition to this, section 4 says:

SEC. 4. That every national bank taking out such notes for issue and circulation shall, on the first days of January and July of each year, pay into the Treasury of the United States, in gold coin, a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent upon the average amount of such notes in actual circulation during the preceding six months, and the tax so paid into the Treasury shall, with the 5 per cent deposited as a guaranty for the payment of the notes, constitute a guaranty fund.

Now, there is a provision for a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent. The Government actuary, according to the report of Secretary Shaw, has demonstrated that a tax of one-eighth of 1 per cent upon the bank circulation would have covered all loss upon the issue of the failed banks from the beginning of our national-bank system to the present time, had each bank maintained its limit of circulation.

Evidently the committee in preparing this bill has kept within the lines of the Secretary's recommendations—has not gone beyond his suggestions; but, by additional provisions, has made the measure stronger than suggested in the Secretary's report.

In addition to that, section 5 provides that—

SEC. 5. That such notes shall be a first lien upon the assets of the respective banks issuing them, and shall be received upon deposit and for all purposes of debt and liability.

The Secretary says in his report of December 2, 1902:

When thus guaranteed and primarily redeemed by the Government at the expense of the bank of issue, currency based on general assets would be as acceptable and as secure as the present national-bank notes based on specific assets.

The Secretary further says:

Neither do I believe it necessary to make currency thus issued a first lien upon assets.

The committee in its wisdom has thought it well that the currency should be a first lien on assets.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PRINCE. Certainly; I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has just read from the report of Secretary Shaw, with reference to the question of making this currency a first lien on assets. I wish to ask him whether it is not a fact that ex-Secretary Gage appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency while it was considering the present bill, and agreed with the present Secretary of the Treasury that it was not a proper thing to make these notes a first lien on the assets of the banks? Does the gentleman remember that statement?

Mr. PRINCE. I am frank to say to my colleague that I was not present at that meeting. I remember he was to be there. If the gentleman says he was and said that, I would not question my colleague's word. If my colleague says it is so, I know him well enough to stand by the statement.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think they both agreed on that point, both the Secretary and the ex-Secretary. Mr. Chairman, I think that the committee had better rise at this time. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] would be entitled to the floor. I do not want to do anything which would deprive him of the right to continue.

Mr. PRINCE. I desire to reserve my right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. No one can take the gentleman off the floor without his consent. I understand he yields with the understanding that he continue.

Mr. PRINCE. I yield with the understanding that I shall retain the floor for the balance of my time.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16228) providing for the issue and circulation of national-bank notes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, with an accompanying draft of a joint resolution providing for the printing of the report of said Commission, and approve of the suggestion therein contained.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 21, 1903.

ADAM STUBER.

Mr. DARRAGH. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill (S. 5118) granting an increase of pension to Adam Stuber.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This will be printed, under the rule.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5118) granting an increase of pension to Adam Stuber, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

A. B. DARRAGH,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
JOS. B. CROWLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
J. R. BURTON,
GEO. TURNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the conferees is as follows:

This bill (S. 5118) passed the Senate at $30 per month, but was amended in the House to $24 per month. Your conferees recommend that the House recede from its amendment. The result of this action will be to restore the rate of the bill, viz, $30 per month, as it originally passed the Senate.

A. B. DARRAGH,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
JOS. B. CROWLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 22, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by Mr. MOODY, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain of the House, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal, ever living God, our Heavenly Father, we bless Thee for that spirit of patriotism and profound gratitude which moves the people throughout our nation to meet in commemoration of the birth of him whom we delight to call the Father of our Country. We thank Thee for that mentality which enabled him to grasp and solve great problems; for that divination which enabled him to penetrate the future and predict results; for that personality which enabled him to command men; for the fervor of his religious nature which enabled him to rely upon Thee for strength and support, and which brought him to his knees at Valley Forge, the darkest hour in that struggle for liberty, right, and justice, where he received consolation and light. Long may his memory live in the hearts of his countrymen, and longer yet his deeds inspire men to truer, nobler life.

We meet here to-day in special service to commemorate the lives and characters of men who have wrought upon the floor of this House and made conspicuous their names in history. We bless Thee for them and for what they did. Let the light which came down from Heaven in the person of Thy Son fill the hearts of the bereaved, that they may see beyond the veil that larger life in the mansions above. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE THOMAS H. TONGUE.

Mr. MOODY (Mr. COOMBS having taken the chair). Mr. Speaker, as the only member of the House of Representatives from the State of Oregon, the melancholy duty devolves upon me to offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. THOMAS H. TONGUE, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Oregon.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, a number of members of the House have indicated their desire to participate in the proceedings of to-day, and some of them are unavoidably absent. I therefore ask unanimous consent for general leave to print.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day in this House of Representatives to pay a last tribute of love and respect to our late distinguished member, the Hon. THOMAS H. TONGUE, of the State of Oregon.

I am well assured that in this instance this is no perfunctory service, but a voluntary offering of our testimonials to the life, character, and public service of a man we all learned to admire and esteem while associated with us as a member of this body.

His sudden demise at an age when his faculties and abilities were capable of the greatest benefit to himself, his family, his State, and his nation is one of those mysterious workings of Providence to which we bow in submission, but with sorrow and regret.

Human life should not be measured by the years which it has spanned, but by the deeds it has accomplished, by its achievements in human action, by the impress such a life may leave upon the community and the State; and judged by such a standard Mr. TONGUE had far exceeded the ordinary limit of life, and has endowed his family and his community with a rich heritage in an honored name.

He moved to Oregon with his parents in 1859, when about 15 years of age. He completed his education at Pacific Grove University, at Forest Grove, Oreg., in 1868. Equipped with a fair degree of learning, a rather frail body, and the genius of an untiring energy and industry, he commenced the battle of life. His was an industry which counts not the hours, but measures the task; that stops not at obstacles, but when they are met rather rejoices at the opportunity of overcoming them. He had a courage, a confidence in his ability to accomplish his objects and desires that never wavered or faltered, and an application of mind and body in every pursuit of life which was almost irresistible. He entered the battle of life with no worldly goods. He carried his all in his head and in his heart, and still he was richer by far than many a young man who has inherited great riches. He was wealthy in those endowments of mind and character which command public confidence and demand the respect and support of men of business affairs.

He stepped into the arena a young man, clear in intellect, with a high moral standard and with an ambition to well deserve the confidence of the public.

He was admitted to the bar in 1870, and at once chose for his home the town of Hillsboro, situate in the beautiful valley of the Willamette, where he continued to reside until his death. Here he labored with his hands and with his head. He despised no honorable task. He was incorruptible in every undertaking, either of private or public nature. His career as a lawyer was successful from the beginning, and he always retained a lucrative practice, but with a temperament so active as was his he could not confine himself wholly to his law practice and engaged quite extensively in farming and stock raising, of which he was very fond.

He took little part in the political affairs of his State until 1888, although from boyhood he had identified himself with and had a keen interest and insight in the policy and success of the Republican party.

In 1888 he was elected to the senate of his State and became chairman of the judiciary committee. From that time until his death he was one of the most prominent factors in the political affairs of his State.

He combined those essential characteristics of statesmanship, integrity of purpose and intuitive and fearless adherence to the principles of fairness and justice, with a patriotism which was almost a passion.

He loved his country, he was proud of his State, and he had a generous affection for all of her citizens.

He was first elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress, and was subsequently elected to the Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, and Fifty-eighth Congresses. He came in with the Administration of President McKinley, heartily in sympathy with the measures and policies recommended by that distinguished President.

He was well equipped in mental training and experience obtained in the legislature of his own State to assume the arduous and often exacting duties of a member of this body.

His modest and retiring demeanor when he first took his seat upon this floor kept his great ability as an orator and an analytic debater concealed through an entire session of Congress, but early in the second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, when the Hawaiian Islands were asking admission to this Republic, he made a speech upon the question of the admission of those islands which called the attention of the House and the entire country to his great ability as a statesman and forensic debater.

His supreme confidence in his country and her duty, her destiny, and her future development can not better be portrayed than by a brief quotation from his speech made at that time.

He said:

I have neither the time nor the inclination to discuss the constitutional questions involved in this resolution. Somewhere there must, and does, reside the sovereign right to annex a people willing to become a part of our Government. I regret that our friends upon the other side of the House are only able to see in the Constitution of this country, not a chart of liberty and a guaranty of freedom, but chains that bind the hands and fetter the feet of a strong young nation struggling to work out its grand destiny.

* * * * * * *

We need these islands, not to enable us to extend our territorial boundaries, but our trade; not political, but commercial empire; not an outlet for growing population, but for growing energies, increasing productions, expanding exports. This is but the beginning. In the coming century the most marked industrial development the world will witness will be in the eastern part of Asia. Her people are awakening from the sleep of centuries. An old but strong giant is just realizing its strength. Realizing their ignorance, they are calling upon us to enlighten and lead them. Led by American skill, American enterprise, American ingenuity, inspired by American energy, their growth and development will be the marvel of the twentieth century.

Mr. TONGUE was, in all his essential characteristics, a type of the splendid manhood developed with the developing country of the far West. His own estimate of the people who have grown into a mighty empire on the Pacific coast is best expressed in his own words, when he says:

The fertility of our soil, the wealth of our forests, the extent of our domain, the enterprise and intelligence of our people, are not known in the East. Our boundless prairies, our magnificent forests, our vast mineral wealth, the healthfulness and salubrity of our climate, escape your notice. Our people are but little better understood. The pioneer men and women who settled in the West were strong and rugged in health as in character, full of energy, courageous in enterprise, thoughtful and ambitious.

The people of the West are bound but little by ancient prejudices. They look little to the past; rather to the present and the future. They prefer yourself to your ancestry. They care little for what you have been or for what you possess, but much for what you are and what you can do. In the West honest work has never ceased to be honorable. With her rugged people the sweat of labor is a kingly crown. Wealth and position earned by honest toil and laudable endeavor are esteemed more than those acquired by the toil and effort of others.

Thus in measuring up the characteristics of his own people he characterizes most effectually himself as one of the highest types of the development of that country.

He was, early in his Congressional career, assigned to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands and to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. In the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, of which he subsequently became chairman, he showed a deep interest and comprehensive thought and knowledge of the development and reclamation of those vast but rich areas of our public domain which are to-day barren, but which may be made fertile by irrigation and later become the homes of settlers and grow into fertile fields.

As a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee he has always been most earnest in his advocacy of the improvement, not only of the waterways of his own State, but of the entire Pacific coast. The large appropriations secured for such improvements in the recent Congresses can be largely traced to his ever-watchful care for the interests of the Pacific coast.

The improvement of the Columbia River at its mouth and at The Dalles was one of the measures that was nearest his heart. He had stated that if he could secure a deep waterway in the Columbia River from The Dalles to the sea he would ask for no more honorable or enduring monument to his memory.

He saw in the improvement of that river at its mouth the precursor of a commerce which would invite the vessels of all nations to trade in the valleys of that great waterway and would add to the wealth and development of his State.

He saw immense possibilities in the improvement at The Dalles and the connecting of the Upper and Lower Columbia by a navigable waterway which would tend to the development of the most fertile and productive, and, I might add, the largest, wheat-growing areas in the world, embracing eastern Oregon, eastern Washington, and western Idaho—an area larger than the States of New York and Pennsylvania combined—which is now largely awaiting the advantages to be derived by the improvement of The Dalles to make this large area the home of millions of prosperous and happy people. Such were his dreams and his ambitions; to such purpose he lent his every energy of mind and body. With him death came all too soon. His purposes were well formed, but the Grim Reaper took him before the harvest was fully ripe. Others will take up the work and carry on the projects, the foundations for which he has so securely laid.

It was my sad duty, as one of the members of a committee, to accompany his remains from the city of Washington to their last resting place, in the State he so dearly loved.

The love and veneration in which he was held were most amply testified to by the people of the entire State as soon as we had entered its borders. Every town and hamlet contributed its entire quota of citizens, who stood along the track with bowed and uncovered heads and with sad faces to watch the passing of our train, bearing all that was left of the friend they loved and the statesman they had lost.

In his own town, on the day of the funeral, thousands gathered from all parts of the State. The governor, all of the State officers, both branches of the legislature, the supreme court, and the judges of the various courts, together with other distinguished citizens of the State, were all there to testify to their love and esteem and their realization of their bereavement. As many as could gathered in the little church which he made his Christian home almost from boyhood, while the sorrowing multitude stood along the street on the outside, heedless of the inclement weather, anxious only to show how keenly they felt the loss of their friend and their representative.

Inside the little church, amidst a wealth of flowers, the old pastor, with trembling voice and faltering words, spoke but the echo of all who had known Mr. TONGUE during his lifetime. It was a touching scene, and one might well say that thrice blest is the man who can thus live in a community and thus die, retaining always the respect, love, and esteem of all.

We followed him to his last resting place in the little grove of pine trees outside of town and consigned him to mother earth in the valley of the Willamette, whose very soil he had enriched by his toil among the people who had watched his growth from boyhood, who had watched him in his rising career, who had rejoiced with his success, and who had sorrowed with his family at the loss of their friend.

The path he had trod from his young manhood to the last hour of his life was not one of ease and worldly pleasure. He courted contact with the stern realities, and matched his great abilities, his sturdy will, and tireless endeavor against the obstacles that might appall one less reliant. But all along that pathway are planted the flowers of friendship, of kindly and generous deeds, which have given out their sweet perfume to bless and gladden the lives of others, and which will continue to grow and shed their fragrance in the years to come.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the uncertainty of our tenure of this house of clay was brought startlingly to the attention of each of us with the passing of our friend and colleague in whose memory we are gathered to-day. One day in the enjoyment of usual health, busily engaged in the discharge of duty and looking confidently forward to the realization of hopes and plans, and the next called from this scene of labor and endeavor to the quiet of the grave and the untried experiences of the land beyond the border.

It is best that it should be so; that the time of our going should be veiled in uncertainty; that there be no visible measure of the span of life, no fixed date of departure hence, for we are by this admonished to so live and strive at all times that when our "summons come to join the innumerable caravan which moves unto the silent halls of death" we may be found like our departed friend, if not with our work and labor completed, at least our tasks so planned and wrought, that portion done so well done, that our life and labors shall present no loose and tangled ends, no ill-formed plans half executed, but so far as time was granted a perfect plan well wrought, the skeins and strands of life well in hand, the structure of our hopes and aims so intelligently and securely reared that he who comes after may build with confidence on the foundations we have laid, and complete with assurance of harmony of plan with purpose the work we had begun.

THOMAS H. TONGUE was a doer of deeds, an earnest thinker, a faithful worker. Whatever he set his hand to do he did with his might. With him no task was trivial, no duty to be performed or responsibility laid was lightly esteemed or slightingly executed. He was of those serious, sturdy natures to whom thoroughness and devotion to duty in every detail is a religion, almost a fetich. His industry and earnestness made him a valuable and effective member of this body and commanded the respect and admiration of his colleagues. In committee he was a power by reason of his mastery of the subjects to which he gave his attention and on the floor efficient by his earnestness and the intense conviction which was apparent in all his utterances.

As is generally the case with deep and earnest natures, he was tender of heart and kindly of spirit, but these qualities he most discovered to those who were intimate with him, and particularly to those bound to him by ties of affection and kinship. He was a good husband, a loving and indulgent father, his family was ever dear to him as he to them, and their happiness and welfare was ever uppermost in his thoughts.

And so one more name is added to the roll of faithful servants of honest, earnest representatives of the people who have passed from the labors here to the rewards of faithful service hereafter. Those whose representative he was on this floor have lost an earnest champion and an effective advocate, the country a painstaking and intelligent lawmaker, his friends a kindly companion, his family a loving guardian and a strong defender.

His advice will be missed in counsel and his voice in debate, but his labors for his State and the nation and his helpful influence in all things shall be neither lost nor forgotten.

It is at once a most sobering and cheering thought that the influence of our lives is never lost and that whatever else may be mortal and transitory our action and influence are immortal; that the trains of causes that our words, thoughts, and deeds set in motion move ever onward and outward through the medium of mind and matter, beyond the shores of the narrow span we call time to the boundless shores of eternity. How all important, then, it is that, like our departed friend, all our acts and all our influences shall be for good, that through them we may live through measureless distances and endless periods, to our everlasting credit and the never-ending benefit of others.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, how appropriate it is that on this Sabbath day, having rested from our usual vocations and with no thought of legislation or suggestion of business, we should here assemble for the purpose of paying our tribute to the memory of one who respected the Sabbath day and kept it holy. On this day, when those who acknowledge allegiance to the great Master of the Universe are wont to assemble and invoke His spirit for their guidance and aid, we, the friends and colleagues of THOMAS H. TONGUE, here assemble for the laudable purpose of doing honor to the memory of one who honored this House by being a member of it, and whose noble and generous deeds in behalf of his country, his State, his people, and his family will ever be cherished in the memory of those who knew him.

For over forty-four years THOMAS H. TONGUE had been a resident of the State of Oregon. His parents were among those sturdy pioneers who in the early day made their way into the valley of the Willamette, where they builded for themselves a home in the wilderness. Our late colleague was then a boy of tender years, but from that time to the day of his death he labored with all his strength and all his energy for the development of that splendid section of our common country. In due time he completed a college and law course and commenced the practice of his profession. Always faithful in the discharge of every duty, he won the confidence of his neighbors and the people of his State, and gradually he was advanced from one position to another until in the election of 1896 he was chosen as Representative from the First district of Oregon to the National Congress.

That he retained the confidence and esteem of his people is evidenced by the ever-increasing majorities which he received at the elections which returned him to the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses and also to the Fifty-eighth. While I had the honor of knowing him in a general way during the Fifty-fifth Congress, it was not until the Fifty-sixth Congress that, by reason of having been assigned to the same committee with him, that of Rivers and Harbors, I came to know him more intimately. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the discharge of its duties knows neither partisanship nor sectionalism. Hence its members become closely attached to each other and work together most harmoniously.

Those who served with Mr. TONGUE on that committee know how faithfully he studied every proposition; how carefully he protected the Public Treasury from unwise expenditure, and how zealously he strove for those things which he believed to be right and just. His other committee assignments gave him exceptional opportunity to advance and protect the interests of his section of the country, and he always availed himself of every legitimate opportunity to work for those things which would be of benefit not only to the whole country, but to the State which in part he had the honor to represent.

I am told that he was always very attentive to departmental duties, and we know that on the floor of this House he was always faithful in attendance, watchful of legislation, and as ready always to support a good measure as to defeat a vicious one. Knowing all this, it is hard for us to realize that his work was finished and that the time had come for him to rest from his labors. Yet it is not for us to question, it is not for us to doubt. He who rules the universe and determines all things had thus ordained, and we can not believe that the book of his life was closed until the accounts were fully balanced. Him whom our friend believed in called him hence, and as he had faithfully followed the Master in this life he was ready to answer "Here am I" when the summons came.

In our weakness and frailty we can not understand why he who seemed so well and strong, so full of life and energy, so able and willing to serve his people and his country, should be called away at such a time and so suddenly. Yet some day we will understand, "for now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now we know in part; then we shall know even as we are known."

On Sunday, January 11, 1903, at the very hour when at his home his family and friends were wont to attend on divine service, he, at the capital city, where his duty called him, and surrounded only by a portion of his family, was summoned, almost without warning, into the presence of his Maker. Verily may it be said of him, as was said by Napoleon of a certain soldier of France, "He died on the field of honor."

We who were selected by the Congress of the United States to act as escort to his remains, performed that duty to the best of our ability.

On Monday evening, the day following his death, we commenced that long, sad journey. With those members of his family who were here we traveled to the west. For five days that journey continued. By night and by day we traveled over plains, across rivers, and through mountain passes. Back over the same route by which he had so lately come, in the strength of his manhood, to discharge the obligations imposed upon him by his people, we now bore his lifeless remains. Down through that section "where rolls the Oregon and hears no sound save its own dashing" we bore him.

Past The Dalles and the Cascades, the Falls of Multnomah, and the Bridal Veil, through the metropolis city of his State, the city in whose splendid commercial and industrial development he took such pride, and where those who knew his worth came in large numbers to join us, we journeyed, and finally out to Hillsboro, his home, we took him. There, just as the shades of night were falling, just as the clouds of darkness were settling o'er the earth and when even the very air seemed heavy with sorrow, and the raindrops fell as falls the tears of affection upon a loved one's bier, we gave over to his fraternal companions and brothers the lifeless remains of our late colleague, while his children, whom we had likewise accompanied, were tenderly received into the arms of friends and neighbors and escorted to that home where the sorely stricken wife and mother waited their return.

On the following day, Sunday, the funeral services were held. The remains were first taken to the county court-house, where as a young lawyer Mr. TONGUE had first pleaded the cause of justice, and where in the practice of his profession he had won victories for truth and right, and there the public were given an opportunity to gaze for the last time upon the face of their representative and friend.

That he was honored by the people and loved by his neighbors was evidenced by the large concourse of people who assembled on that occasion. The governor and the leading officers of the State were there. Nearly all the members of both branches of the legislature were there. The societies of which he had been a faithful and useful member, the Masons, the Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, attended in large delegations, each member wearing the badge of mourning and each feeling he had indeed lost a brother.

The floral decorations were most beautiful, ranging from large set pieces to the smallest bouquet, and came alike from the rich and poor, evidence of the love and affection which all the people had for him.

The services proper were held in the Methodist Church, of which Mr. TONGUE had for years been a member, and were conducted by the pastors of the different churches of the village. The prayer was offered by Rev. Cline, a former pastor of the church and an intimate friend of the family, and the principal address was delivered by Dr. Rockwell, of Portland, who also had long been a personal friend of the deceased and of his family.

At the conclusion of the services at the church the remains were taken to the cemetery. There, just as the sun was sinking and as twilight came about us, beneath the shadow of the pine and fir, and almost within view of the place which had for so long been his home, his remains, according to the beautiful burial service of the Masonic order, were consigned to their last resting place. And there we left him. Left him with those with whom and for whom he had so long labored. Left him with those whom he loved and those whom he had served. To them his lifeless clay belongs, but the splendid achievements he had wrought for his people and for his country belong not alone to the people of Hillsboro, but as well to the State of Oregon and to the country, and long will those who knew and appreciated his worth mourn his death.

The people of Hillsboro lost a good neighbor and faithful friend, an industrious and active citizen. The State of Oregon lost a man who, by reason of his ability and experience, was eminently qualified to care for its interests and advance its welfare, and the nation lost a public servant whose breadth of mind and conscientious study made him one of its most useful legislators.

But there are some who by reason of his death have suffered a still greater loss. The home circle, which to him was ever the center of all his earthly affections, has been broken. The aged parents have lost the care and protection of a dutiful son. His children have lost a kind-hearted and loving parent, and she who for so many years had been the object of his tenderest care and solicitude has lost a true and devoted husband.

Within the sacred portals of that home, now the abode of sorrow and affliction, we would not intrude. Words of comfort and consolation from practical strangers are of but little avail, yet we venture out of our sincere sympathy to offer them. To the broken-hearted widow it may seem now as if there was no ray of light from out the future, yet "He who doeth all things well" has said to those so sorely afflicted, "I will not leave thee nor forsake thee." Left to comfort, sustain, and protect her are the children of her family, manly sons and queenly, loving daughters, who will ever do their utmost to take the place of the one who has gone on before. Upon their strong arms she can lean for support until finally waking on the other shore she will find stretched out to greet her the arms of him who for so many years sheltered and protected her here.

In that romance of early Indian Oregon the author of the "Bridge of the Gods" has beautifully expressed the thought of that union hereafter when referring to the unchangeableness of the mighty Columbia, which, notwithstanding constant and continuous change in other things, still flows onward, ever onward, to the sea. He says, "Generation after generation, daring hunter, ardent discoverer, silent Indian—all the shadowy peoples of the past have sailed its waters as we sail them, have lived perplexed and haunted by mystery as we live, have gone out into the Great Darkness with hearts full of wistful doubt and questioning, as we go; and still the river holds its course, bright, beautiful, inscrutable. It stays; we go. Is there anything beyond the darkness into which generation follows generation and race follows race? Surely there is an after life, where light and peace shall come to all who, however defeated, have tried to be true and loyal; where the burden shall be lifted and the heartache shall cease; when all the love and hope that slipped away from us here shall be given back to us again and given back forever."

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, when the announcement was made on Sunday, January 11 last, that our colleague, the Hon. THOMAS H. TONGUE, had suddenly expired at his place of residence in this city, it cast a gloom over his friends and all of his associates who had known him well. Death came to him without warning and as suddenly as "the twinkling of the eye." Although at the time the partner of his bosom, his beloved wife, was absent at their home in the far distant West, he had a son and daughter present to tenderly care for him.

To those whose lives have not been lived with virtue and charity as prescribed by the standard of the Christian, the sudden and unexpected approach of the "dread messenger" must come with horror and with awe. But when death knocks at the door of one who has lived in peace with his God and his fellow-man, who has practiced the sublime tenets of the Golden Rule and discharged his duty to society by a clean and honorable life, we can but know that his approach must be greeted with calm solemnity and reverential regard, for the peace and resignation of the true Christian betokens this fact and is a blessed assurance thereof. So it must have been with our distinguished departed friend on his entrance to his eternal journey, that "dull, mysterious exodus of death."

My acquaintance with him began in the Fifty-sixth Congress, but it was not until the present Congress, when he was made chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, that I learned to know him well. I found him ever a sincere, honest, patient, painstaking, and courteous companion, who always conscientiously discharged every duty devolving upon him, but specially made his legislative work a matter of first importance, to which every other duty must yield.

He rarely addressed the House, but when any pending legislation affecting his people or his section claimed his attention, he always spoke with a clearness and directness and with such true sincerity of purpose that he at once secured and held the attention of his colleagues—a power which few members possess.

I was one of the funeral escort that accompanied his remains to his far-distant home, near the Pacific coast.

Over the dreary plains and prairies, along the banks of the beautiful and historic Columbia, whose legends he was so wont to relate, we patiently bore him until we reached his home in the land of the setting sun, where we tenderly gave him to his sorrowing family and friends; and there all that was mortal of our esteemed colleague was laid in the tomb, where he will rest in the beautiful valley of the Willamette until resurrection morn.

THOMAS H. TONGUE must have been a rare man, for no ordinary man could have had paid to him the tribute of love and respect which was tendered his mortal remains. Unusual public and civic honors were shown him, and the attendant ceremonies would have befitted the demise of an exalted ruler. Not only his neighbors at his home in the town of Hillsboro but friends from distant parts of the State of Oregon came to pay tribute of respect to his memory.

Both branches of the legislature of his State came from the capital to show him reverence, those bodies having adjourned in his honor. The members of the supreme court were present to share in the sorrow. To show him respect came from the city of Portland many of its best citizens, irrespective of political affiliations; and the society of Odd Fellows, Masons, Pythians, and other orders of which he was an honored member attended the funeral in a body. All churches united in their services at his funeral. So great an outpouring of all classes is seldom seen, showing esteem and respect to the memory of their fellow-man; but such honors were richly deserved by the able and efficient legislator, the pure and honorable man, and the faithful public servant that he was.

Our friend was of "faithful English blood." "No persecution merciless and blind drove over the sea, that desert desolate," this man and his family, as was the lot of many of the first and early settlers of the Eastern coast. Attracted by the tempting allurements of the fertile land of the West, to better their fortunes came his parents and settled in the splendid valley of the Willamette. Reared in the school of the pioneer, he received that strong and sturdy training which develops character and self-reliance. He grew to manhood imbued with the best thoughts and aspirations of a liberty-loving American and impressed by the environments of a section rich in fertility as well as in story and in lore.

By his lofty character and his devotion to duty he became thoroughly embedded in the confidence of his people. He lived a life of rectitude and died with the genuine regret of his colleagues and his fellow-countrymen. If I were asked what were his most striking characteristics displayed in his intercourse with his fellow-members of Congress, I should say honesty and a thorough dedication of himself to duty—as a great dramatist calls it, "the modesty of fearful duty."

In this world, if we conduct ourselves so as to justly merit the esteem and confidence of our fellow-men, and establish a character for sterling integrity, for lofty patriotism, for unswerving loyalty to duty and the possession of Christian principles, we will not have lived our lives in vain. Such was the conduct and such the character of the late Hon. THOMAS H. TONGUE, and his children and his children's children may delight in the possession of this rich heritage which he has so surely transmitted to them.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, as a Representative in part, upon this floor, from one of the Pacific coast States, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the high character, worth, and ability of the late THOMAS H. TONGUE, whose sudden death so shocked the membership of this House and brought poignant grief to his family, his friends, and a deep feeling of almost irreparable loss to the State of Oregon.

As disclosed by the Congressional Directory, THOMAS H. TONGUE was one of 16 members elected to this House of the Fifty-seventh Congress who was of foreign birth and parentage. Notwithstanding his foreign birth, however, he was an intense American in the highest sense of the word. His parents in his early life came to this country and settled in Oregon, where he was educated, and where he achieved his success.

Mr. TONGUE was intensely loyal to the State of Oregon, to the Pacific coast, and to the West. This loyalty, however, was neither narrow nor sectional. He believed most firmly that whatever was beneficial to the nation was beneficial as well to the Pacific coast and to the West. He had no sympathy nor patience with those who advocated that a policy beneficial to the East was antagonistic to the welfare of the West, and his votes upon this floor exemplify this belief, and yet, at the same time, he zealously and loyally, and with signal ability and success, promoted and protected, by his course in this body, the true interests of his constituency and of his State.

Mr. TONGUE, immediately upon his admission to the bar in the year 1870, began the practice of law at Hillsboro. He was unusually successful, achieving a high standing at the bar of his State, a bar numbering among its members some of the great legal lights of our country. Hillsboro is a small town of about fifteen hundred inhabitants. It is not far from Portland, the metropolis of Oregon, and although his reputation as a lawyer was such that he could probably have removed to the larger field of Portland, where undoubtedly he would have been accorded immediate recognition, still his love for and loyalty to the community in which he had achieved his successes were so great that the thought of removing did not appeal to him. Before his death he had plans drawn for the erection of a building in Hillsboro, in which he hoped to maintain a thoroughly modern law office. His life is an exemplification of the fact that as great success can be achieved in the small rural communities as in the more congested centers of population.

In this rural community his life work, outside of that accomplished in this Hall, was wrought. Here his material interests were centered. In addition to his long and active career as a lawyer he found time to engage in agricultural pursuits and in the raising of live stock. He was a great lover of the horse—the noblest of all animals. He bred and raised some of the best trotting stock in Oregon. His interest and pride in this avocation was simply because of his love for this noble beast.

His work as a member of this body during the Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses is well known to us all. Literally speaking, he died in harness, at the very height of his usefulness, and in his death the State of Oregon loses a useful, loyal, and experienced Representative, and this House a conservative, painstaking member, and many of us a true friend.

He is survived by his aged father and mother, loving wife, five beautiful daughters, and two manly sons. To them his sudden demise is a cruel blow; yet this obedient son, this loving husband, this kindly father, left an example to them which time in its course, let us hope, may temper the grief which now seems almost inconsolable.

As one of and with those appointed by the Speaker of this House to accompany the remains of our late colleague to his final resting place, and in the presence of hundreds of his neighbors and friends, we laid him in that land described by Joaquin Miller as—

The mist-kissed shores of Oregon.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I can hope to add little to the eloquent and touching tributes which have to-day been paid to the memory of THOMAS H. TONGUE. Those who knew him well and intimately have told the story of his public life, of his long and faithful service to the people of his State and country. And yet I feel that I must speak at least briefly of my own sense of personal loss and of the esteem I had for one who by ability and unflagging industry had made himself an honored an useful member of this House.

His sudden death was so great a shock to me that I can hardly yet realize that he has gone; that a life so full of usefulness and promise has ended. He was at the very height of that usefulness when the summons came. Had he been permitted to live no one who knew of the faithfulness with which he had served the people of his State and of their firm and abiding confidence in him could doubt that he would have continued in the public service for many years, and would have been called to positions of still greater honor and responsibility. It is not to be wondered at that the people of Oregon sincerely mourn the loss of one who worked with all his strength for their interests, who had for so many years stood that most satisfactory of all tests, the test of service, and had not been found wanting.

It is my good fortune to have served upon the same committee with him for four years. The long weeks and months spent in the committee room in the preparation of great appropriation bills afford an unusual opportunity to form a clear and just estimate of the character and worth of a man. The hearty tributes to which you have just listened show the respect and regard in which Mr. TONGUE was held by those who have been so intimately associated with him in the public service. They have borne testimony to an honest admiration for sterling qualities and devotion to duty.

He was attentive to business and showed so thorough a knowledge of commercial conditions and the needs of the country that we always derived profit from listening to his views. Ready at all times to fight for the interests of his State, he was nevertheless broad minded and liberal in his views, and did not seek to advance the welfare of his own part of the country by sacrificing that of another section. In the committee room of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors there is a sincere purpose to eliminate party lines and sectional lines in the consideration of projects which are designed to promote the interests of our common country. With that purpose Mr. TONGUE was in hearty accord and never permitted his actions to be governed by narrow prejudice. As a member of that committee, I esteem it a privilege to be permitted to give public expression, inadequate though it be, to my appreciation of his faithfulness and my realization of the loss to the public service caused by his untimely death.

About two years ago I had the pleasure of visiting his home and meeting many of his friends and neighbors. I am glad I had that opportunity to witness the regard in which he was held by those among whom he had lived for so many years. Their pride in him was very evident; that they looked on him as a tried and true friend was clear. After all there is no success in life which can bring to a man the happiness which comes from the friendship and approval of his home folks. That he had in such full measure as to amply compensate him for all the years of hard work and untiring effort.

The sorrow which has befallen his family is very great, and I do not want to close without a word of tender and sincere sympathy for them. His friends here are mourning with them. During the years which are to come they can not fail to find comfort in the memory of his distinguished life, characterized so signally by love for the State and country he had served so well. He has gone from us, but he was so full of life I can not think of him as dead.

There are no dead; we fall asleep
To waken where they never weep.
We close our eyes to pain and sin,
Our breath ebbs out, but life flows in.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, in the sudden death of Mr. THOMAS H. TONGUE we realize fully the words of the Scripture that "in the midst of life we are in death," and that death comes "like a thief in the night." His death was perhaps the most sudden of any of our members in the present Congress. I saw him only three days before his death in the office of the Chief of Engineers, where I was transacting some business in connection with the committee of which he also was a member. Recalling that I had seen him there only three days before, apparently so well and hearty, I could not realize the fact when informed on Sunday morning that he was dead.

I was one of those appointed to attend his funeral, to take that long journey across the continent from one ocean to the other—nearly 3,300 miles—and it was a melancholy satisfaction to accompany him on that last earthly journey. I will not attempt to describe it to you. That has been done already in most eloquent language by three of the gentlemen who have preceded me. I wish to say, however, that I think it is a beautiful custom which this House observes—that of sending a guard of honor to escort the remains of our deceased brothers to their last resting place when they die here at the post of duty. It is certainly as little as we can do.

Mr. TONGUE was exceedingly popular in his district. It was a district normally Republican by three to four thousand majority. But his majority at the last election was 7,318. When he first ran, in 1896, there was a fusion between the Populists and the Democrats, and his defeat by fully 1,000 majority was in advance conceded. He won by a majority of 65. At the next election he swelled that majority to 2,090. In 1900 he swelled it to 3,100, and in 1902 it reached 7,318. Think how eloquently these figures speak—65 majority in 1896 increased to a majority of 7,318 in 1902, and that in a district which, as I have said, was normally Republican by not more than 3,500 majority. The majority to which Mr. TONGUE thus attained speaks in thunder tones of the work and worth of the man.

He was quite as popular with Democrats as with Republicans. I was told by a distinguished Democrat of the city of Portland—an old, gray-headed man, standing by the bier of Mr. TONGUE—that he had always supported THOMAS H. TONGUE; that party cut no figure with him when it came to voting for such a man. He said that Mr. TONGUE was the poor man's friend, the man who could always be relied upon to fight the cause of the poor at all times and in all places. These simple words coming from a venerable man, prominent as a Democrat, spoke to me more eloquently of his true worth and splendid character than a volume of commonplaces.

There were many factional differences in Mr. TONGUE's district and State, but with rare good judgment he managed to keep friendly with both sides. Yet he was a man who never shirked any matter of principle, but always drove straight ahead for what was right.

He had friends in both factions, and that is proved by the immense majorities he received in his recent elections. When the Senatorial fight began, which has just closed in Oregon, Mr. TONGUE was urgently solicited by a number of his friends to become a candidate. They insisted that he had never taken part in the factional fights of his State, that he had friends on both sides, and the strongest chance of winning. He felt, however, that his candidacy would jeopardize the interests of men who had been loyal to him in the past, and he declined positively to have anything to do with that contest.

When the agitation respecting the Spanish war first started, Mr. TONGUE bitterly opposed the thought of war, and when the Maine was blown up in Habana Harbor he was extremely anxious that there should be a careful investigation before any declaration of war. He was a natural conservative and abhorred hasty action. When, however, hostilities were once declared, the Government had no stronger supporter than he. He did his utmost by counsel and advice to raise regiments in his own State, and though he never posed in Congress as an orator, yet when an attack was made, or what he deemed to be an attack, upon the regiments from his State and from other portions of the country, he raised his voice in language which to me is extremely eloquent. I do not think I can say anything better of him than to read here and put on record again the language used by him on that occasion. He was discussing the Second Oregon and its experiences in the Philippine Islands, and in part he said:

The quality of the men who composed the Second Oregon was indicated by a brief order of General Wheaton at Melinto: "Orderly, overtake those Oregon greyhounds on the road to Polo and order them to Melinto. Go mounted, or you will never catch them." When, after the glorious victory at Malabon, General Wheaton was asked, "Where are your regulars?" he pointed to the Second Oregon, saying, "There are my regulars." A volume would not record the heroic deeds of those boys. At Malabon those brave young soldiers charged across the open rice fields, upon which they left many dead and wounded, in the face of a murderous fire from an entrenched foe and planted the Stars and Stripes upon the fortification of a defeated enemy. No veterans the world ever saw showed more cool, steady, and determined courage than the boys of the Second Oregon in that magnificent conflict.

Like true heroes they rose equal to their opportunities and the occasion, met every emergency, responded to every demand, discharged every duty, laughed at every danger, and left behind them a record of heroic achievements never excelled in any land or in any age. Not only the State of Oregon, not only their own country, but their race should be proud of such men. Their record proves what humanity can and will achieve, what it can and will suffer, when duty calls for great suffering or great achievement.

Then, as though anticipating his own death, he gave utterance to these beautiful words respecting those Oregon "greyhounds" who had died on the field of battle:

A word for the heroic dead. They have performed the noblest and sublimest act it is given to humanity to achieve; they have given their lives for their country. Theirs were not lives nearing their close, worn-out with dissipation, broken with toil, devoid of hope, their cup of happiness drained to the dregs, and nothing left worth living for. Theirs were lives at the beginning, unspent, everything to hope, everything to achieve, everything to live for. Before the prime of manhood had been reached their life's work had been done and well done. Their rest will be eternal, their fame secure. For those who returned, full of hope and full of honor, life holds many temptations and many dangers; the rest and happiness they crave may not be theirs.

Hope may turn to disappointment; the honors they have so proudly won may be sullied; we hope and pray not. The fame and honor of no man is safe this side of the grave. But the fame of these heroic men, "dead on the field of honor," is secure. Their honor will be forever unsullied, their memory will be like sweet perfume. They have received and are wearing their crown, and no power on earth or in heaven will pluck it from their brows.

On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

Like the brave men so beautifully eulogized, he, too, gave his life for his country, and his fame, "dead on the field of honor," is secure. We all mourn his untimely end, and point to his useful, well-spent life with honest pride and satisfaction. Such men as he have made of America the greatest nation on earth, and as long as she continues to produce them her destiny is safe.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, this Congress has furnished an unprecedented record in the number of its members who have been taken away. Their departure has brought death very near to every one of us. It is hardly a poetic exaggeration to say—

Men drop so fast ere life's midstage we tread,
Few know so many friends alive as dead.

Yet in their loss there is a priceless heritage for us. It teaches, in the first place, how fleeting must be a legislative career at best; and in that broader aspect of its influence upon the country death smoothens asperities, it destroys animosities, it buries forever sectional distrust. It admonishes us to think less of party and of State and more of the country and of humanity.

No death was more sudden or unexpected than that of THOMAS H. TONGUE. In the evening he was conversing pleasantly with his son and with his daughter. On the morrow he was cold in death. Swiftly following constant messages of love and of hope to his father and mother, his wife and children on the far-off Pacific coast, came the telegraphic message, like a cloud in the clear sky, announcing his death.

His life was essentially that of a pioneer. He went to Oregon before its admission as a State; twelve years before a railway had been constructed within its borders; at a time when this great Commonwealth, now numbering more than 400,000 people, had less than 50,000; when Portland, now a prosperous and growing metropolis, was little more than a struggling village.

His early surroundings inured him to toil and adversity. No royal road to success was before him, but the very obstacles with which he had to contend stimulated those mighty hopes that make men great.

He was essentially a product of the country, and, just as rural surroundings furnish a clearer physical air, so they furnish a clearer moral atmosphere, and they exercised a very prominent influence upon his life work. He would be called a lawyer, but he was interested as well in farming and in public affairs. He was in touch with a great multitude of people and a great variety of interests, so that the simpler phases of life combined with those enterprises and interests which are regarded as greater and more important. He came to Washington all untried and unknown. It was necessary for him to learn the rules and to familiarize himself with the complicated methods in which business is transacted. But so far as regards honesty and patriotism he had no need of any lessons. These were implanted in him in the beginning, and he furnished an illustration of the fact that for a career in Congress that equipment which is most needed and which in the long run must tell most powerfully is conscience and regard for duty. His legislative career, though not long, nevertheless has its monuments. He was chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands at the time when that very important innovation was adopted, by which the Central Government undertakes the reclamation of vast tracts of desert lands. His name will be inseparably linked with this measure, under which millions of acres will be added to the national domain of arable lands, which it is hoped will furnish additional opportunity and additional prosperity to our common country.

As a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors his first solicitude was for his State and for the Pacific coast; but, like all others, he came to realize the importance of those broader responsibilities and duties which cause a man to lay hold upon all the interests of this great country. He recognized the importance of improved methods of internal communication, recognized how much the growth of the country depends upon the development of our ports and inland waterways, and, while conservative and careful, he favored that liberal policy which made him a strong supporter of improvements of this nature.

As regards the personal consideration and esteem in which he was held, the opinion of his colleagues can be best expressed by some resolutions adopted on the day following his death, which were in these words:

We, the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, assembled at the Capitol, this 12th day of January, 1903, desire in the most earnest way to express our sense of loss at the death of our esteemed associate, Hon. THOMAS H. TONGUE, of Oregon, who died at his residence in Washington, January 11, 1903.

We each and all further desire to bear testimony to his splendid ability, great earnestness, and indefatigable industry. As a member of this committee he was untiring in his efforts and exhibited profound comprehension of the commercial necessities of our country. We recognize him as one who earnestly labored for his constituency and, in a most patriotic way, for his country. His genial companionship endeared him to all of us, and in his sudden death we feel a great personal loss. The State of Oregon and the country at large have lost a valuable, honest, and capable representative.

Resolved, That this expression of our esteem for him and of our sense of personal loss be spread upon the records of this committee and a copy thereof be presented to his family.

We can say of him that he was our friend, faithful and just to us; but if our personal loss is great, how much greater must be the loss and how much keener the sorrow of the father and mother, each more than fourscore, whose hope he was; of the beloved wife, who heard the sudden news of his death; of the sons and daughters, to whom he gave his constant solicitude and affection? Our words can not be adequate to express our sympathy for them or to describe the magnitude of their bereavement.

With this poor tribute, we must bid him farewell. We leave his mortal remains in the cemetery of the little village where he always loved to dwell. There let the low winds over mountain and valley die down to a requiem in his memory. In his life work, although he was cut off before his career had reached its full fruition of accomplishment, there is nevertheless an inspiration and an example which will be like a flower of perennial bloom to all those who knew him, because of his faithful, conscientious, brave service for his State and for his country.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, eulogy should never become fulsome, yet it is right to speak of those essentials which select men to play more than ordinary characters in the drama of life and to become a part of the public events of their time and country. If a man in public life leaves a memory which may be cherished by a community, he has done much to preserve the principles which make republics immortal. His achievements are necessarily contracted to the circumstances of his life, and while exceptional men may extend to a wider fame, yet it is doubtful if even they could not have accomplished more of good by confining their talents to their communities.

The life and character of the late THOMAS H. TONGUE were typical of the great Western surroundings which nursed and energized his ambitions. He represented, in part, a State through which courses mighty rivers flowing on to a limitless sea. Its valleys are rich and beautiful, while its mountains are wrapped in the shrouds of the storm. These are the scenes which inspired the farmer boy and gave to his mind the ambition to make his own land fulfill the lordly conditions for which nature had created it. This to him was the art, the duty, of the legislator. One man could but do his part. Diversified interests, dissimilar toils, make the Republic's glory. The country may well suffer the omissions growing out of too much loyalty to local interests.

But while Mr. TONGUE was an ardent advocate of the particular interests of his State, upon the varied questions engaging public thought he showed an enlightenment brought from the mine of research and study. He was studious, careful, and painstaking. Yet his knowledge was not all confined to the principles he gathered from books; that greater teacher, Nature, had unloosed her golden clasps and from her infinite variety had inspired the love which > Finds tongues in trees, books in running brooks,

> Sermons in stones, and good in everything.

The towering mountains about him echoed the truths of Sinai, and inspired the early faith in which he lived and died a Christian. He sought not the loud way to fame. Diffidence was so much a part of his character that he shrank from the crowd. History had undoubtedly taught him how, in some olden time, men fought their way to savage renown; how song was once inspired by the fame of barbaric deeds, and legend sought only to preserve their memorials. Yet he looked upon a fame more enduring; not so much upon that which might blazon a name, but upon that by which good deeds are consecrated to immortality. He was satisfied with the applause which should come from the little good contributed to the growth of a State.

Fidelity to particular interests promotes these purposes. In these essentials he fought bravely, he accomplished well. Unassuming, he sought to add to the greater glory of the Republic by enhancing the pride, the reverence, the gratitude of one of its parts. He augmented that great Western development which will lead to the time when the burden of empire will change, fulfilling the poetic prophecy that "Westward the star of empire takes its way." The little achievements, minute as they are in design, contribute to the ultimate purposes of national life, and the motives which impel them are as sublime as if they had inspired the thoughts that shake the universe.

Mr. TONGUE might truthfully be called a pioneer in the upbuilding of the West. In 1859, at the age of 15 years, he settled in the county of Washington, Oreg., the place which was to witness his trials and struggles and which he was to behold, emerging from frontier and border life into busy cities with quickening impulses, the changes which now inspire men with unbounded hope in the future destiny. His life and energy partook of the spirit of these surroundings. The imposing character of the silent woods and the rushing streams led to a thousand prophecies indulged by youth and ambition, wrapping in dreams the shapes of the future. Yet life there was not all a dreamland. To have received an education in the West at that time required arduous devotion to study which took time from the realities surrounding life and stole blissful moments from alluring scenes, too apt to break into the method required for mental discipline. However, life in the pathless woods did much to shape his better thoughts.

Early impressions—the impressions of the boy—remain forever, and in his older and sublimer musings man will turn to the first teachings of solitude. People flocked to the far West in early times; it was a marvelous land where men could throw off restraint and where the human heart itself was the only guide in the wild pulsations of border life. Out of this grew a new order which history had not foretold, a society which, without the restraint of law, bound license within the narrow confines of right and conscience and made one of the remarkable epochs of civilization—a life whose characters are immortalized by the verse of Bret Harte, in whose finer touches the truth may be found how within the rugged exterior the heart will move on, creating for itself the law of self-restraint.

Mr. TONGUE was chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands in the Fifty-seventh Congress. This committee reported a bill providing for a utilization of waste waters upon arid and semiarid lands by the expenditure of revenues from the sale of the public domain. This measure is calculated to evolve from nature economic forces sufficient to supply unborn millions with toil and sustenance. With the other members of this committee, Mr. TONGUE worked patiently upon this measure until it was perfected, though surrounded at times by a hostility that thought it saw special favors in a public measure of great magnitude.

While the West has a history of romance, history has not yet written her greatest achievements. It has been by the persistent early workers that it has been known. If a Representative becomes more insistent in the West than seems consistent with ordinary duty, it is for the reason that it must needs be so. Individual efforts must achieve what in other places it is immemorial custom to do. It is hard to give up the old for the new, and men around whom cluster the traditions of centuries look with alarm upon the things which take shape from the new fancies flitting from woods but half explored. These throw an embarrassment around a Western member. Yet, withal, Mr. TONGUE was a successful legislator, and began improvements in his district with which his name will be associated.

Physically he was not strong, yet in him hope rose triumphant above life's frailties, and with hope sprang glorious cities and mighty commerce to crown the West in his own day and time. All of the creations of the young mind were long ago fulfilled and the magic visions which peopled the sunlit valleys became real. He loved the West, and read in her sunset prophecies the destinies of peoples yet to be. He was part of the events of a great time, and was a member of a Congress which took upon itself the solemn obligations of a war, and with war the untold obligations to a more extended humanity.

The doubts with which it was brought have passed away, the hopes have found fruition. In all of these great affairs he had the courage which conquers and the faith which made that conquest righteous. His life is rounded with a sleep and he rests amid the glorious monuments of his far Western home. He hears no more the faint echoes of the world's applause; the mighty debate, the big wars, his country's fame can not arouse him. His integrity to Heaven is all he dares now call his own. Secure in that, he can well leave the lordly projects of life to disturb and fret other men, who in their time may point to their achievements and may be trace a beginning to those early conditions which his life and character helped to form.

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, it was my fortune to be associated with THOMAS H. TONGUE as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, and thereby was afforded the opportunity to become well acquainted with him. Anyone brought thus in contact with him would not fail to recognize in him great force and worth. He had the courage of his convictions at all times. He was profoundly imbued with the potentialities of the State which commissioned him to represent it in part in this Chamber. He recognized Oregon as a splendid State in this Union of States, and his mental grasp encompassed her future greatness when her population would be multiplied and her internal improvements had developed her into a great commercial center.

Charged in part with the guidance of any and all Congressional action which specially pertained to Oregon, he always advised such legislation as would meet the demands of her future necessities. In this work his efforts were unceasing. The member of Congress who faithfully represents at once the interests of his district and of his State, who complies with all of the demands made upon him by his people, and who tempers these interests and these demands with the greater ones of his common country, has a labor before him which will challenge his ability, his strength, and his endurance.

Mr. TONGUE labored unceasingly to meet these requirements, and he came as nearly reaching their full measure of accomplishment as any of us. Thus persevering, thus faithful to the trust that had been reposed in him, thus ever energetic in the duties before him, thus striving for that which is best for his State and for the nation, he met every responsibility with care, confidence, and ability. He beat back the evidences of ill health and failing strength until, when the summons came, it was with that suddenness that brought a shock to all who knew him. But after all was not that the merciful way? Permitted to enjoy to the last the full measure of his mental strength; useful to the last to his family, his State, and his nation; happy in the consciousness that he was contributing to the well-being of the present and future generations; loved by a large circle of close friends, and admired by a great constituency; living in the path of rectitude, may he not have said, "I have fought a good fight, and it is finished."

Death is seldom, if ever, a welcome messenger. It draws the veil that shuts out the vision of the future. The journey of life is from birth to death. To some the journey is full of trouble, to others it is peaceful; to some it is full of bitterness, and to others it is replete with happiness. But to all alike, whether we pass this way in peace and joy or in sadness and suffering, there is a sense of uncertainty as to the future; but somehow, some way, the Divine plan is such that each of us is inspired with a hope of immortality, that death is not the end of all, but that there is a future better than the present. By faith we believe in a future state of happiness; and faith is not an idle whim. Faith is the strongest force that controls our actions here. We all do more things based upon faith than upon any other force.

This great force which we call faith inspires within us a confidence that this intellectual being which we call the soul shall live on after the dissolution of the body. I believe that it is easier for the logical and analytical mind to believe in a future state than to disbelieve in it, and thus believing, if we shall emulate the virtues of our departed friend, may we not say with Bryant—

So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. DOVENER. Mr. Speaker, again we have met in this Hall in sorrowful remembrance of our friends and colleagues who have been parted from us by the stern mandate of death. The large number of such bereavements experienced by this House can not but furnish us all a solemn and impressive reminder of the brevity of life and the uncertainty of its tenure; and the vacant chairs which we see about us on every hand seem to warn us, "Be ye also ready."

As one who had grown to know and thoroughly appreciate the value of his frieadship and society, I desire on this occasion to bear witness to the worth of our departed fellow-member, THOMAS H. TONGUE, and to express my deep regret for his untimely death. Mr. TONGUE was still in the prime of life, and apparently had only just begun a long career of public usefulness. This was his third term in Congress, and his experience gained in the Fifty-fifth had enabled him to become in the Fifty-sixth and the present Congress a legislator of force and influence, a man of distinction and power. His death was a loss to family and friends, a loss to the interests of national legislation, a loss to the General Government and the nation, a loss to the State of Oregon, that he so faithfully and ably served.

Mr. TONGUE was comparatively young in the public service. Two whole decades of his life were devoted to the assiduous study and practice of the law, in which profession he gained and merited a high reputation, and it was not until he was about 45 years of age that his fellow-citizens singled him out for political honors and prevailed upon him to enter public life. He was then sent to the Oregon State senate, where, though a new member, he was soon advanced to the chairmanship of the judiciary committee. His sound judgment and executive ability were further recognized by the leaders of his party in the State of Oregon by electing him to the chairmanship of various Republican State conventions, committees, and other organizations, and finally his district chose him to represent its interests here.

How well he justified the confidence of his constituency, how well he executed the commissions intrusted to his care, it is needless for me to describe in detail. What was thought about his Congressional record at home is best illustrated by the fact that he was twice reelected by increased majorities. We who have been his associates know that Mr. TONGUE was one of the most faithful, one of the most efficient, untiring, and devoted representatives of the people among our number. He was constantly engaged in the prosecution of some matter of importance to his constituents or to the public in general. On many matters of the first importance arising in this Chamber for decision his voice and opinion had weight and influence.

In committee work, as I can testify, having served with him for three years on one of the hardest-worked committees of the House, Mr. TONGUE was faithful, efficient, and untiring. All the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I feel sure, share my admiration for Mr. TONGUE'S ability and willingness as a worker and for his genial and kindly qualities as an associate. In his personal relations courteous and affable, he was kind and helpful to all.

We can not hope to retain the presence of those we love, we can not hope to retain the services of the most useful members of society, indefinitely. "Threescore years and ten" is the allotted span of life. But it must excite unusual sorrow and regret when a valuable and honorable life, like that of Mr. TONGUE'S, is cut short by premature death. It is not mete or proper that we should complain or criticise, but we can not but lament such dispensations of Providence. We trust that all is now well with our departed friend and colleague, that as he has often merited and received the approbation of his associates here, so now may he have heard that last and most important welcome, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, human life has been likened to a bridge spanning a wide and dangerous stream. The multitudes enter and crowd each other upon the nearer approach of the way, but soon the ranks begin to thin. Through openings here and there the reckless and the careful alike fall in their onward tread; some near the entrance, others far out from shore, until all have sunk into the rushing, whirling waters below. Still others have compared human life to a mighty river, ever gliding onward, bearing upon its bosom the frail human barks that have been launched from its shores to a vast unknown sea, but upon whose waters somewhere humanity is to find the ultimate home of the soul. A poet has beautifully said:

Our lives are rivers, gliding free
To that unfathomed, boundless sea,
The silent grave!
Thither all earthly pomp and boast
Roll, to be swallowed up and lost
In one dark wave.

How true the comparison is attested by the scenes and incidents of everyday life. The pallid cheek of death, the funeral cortège, the habiliments of mourning, the tolling of the bell, the newly made grave—all speak of dissolution and proclaim the disappearance of another and another beneath the waters that sweep on into the great sea of eternity. No age or condition in life is exempt from the inexorable decree that dooms man to death and his body to the grave. The strong, the weak, the old, and the young are ever being garnered by that "reaper whose name is Death."

Mr. Speaker, how often have we been reminded of this during the few years even that I have been a member of this body! How often have we seen the desk of some friend and colleague draped in mourning! How frequently have we gathered on this floor during the past eight years to pay sad but loving tribute to the memory of some friend whose life had ended midst his labors here! How often have we seen the procession leave this Capitol and wending its way to a distant State, maybe in the North, perhaps beyond the plains to the sunset side of our land, or maybe in the far South, where, amidst family and friends, some one of our members who had fallen by the wayside has been gently laid to rest.

How different, too, has the summons come in individual cases. To some the hour of departure has been struck after days of disease and suffering, to others the messenger has come when the allotted span of earthly existence had been traversed and a life work had been accomplished, while upon others the blow has fallen suddenly and without warning, when the body was apparently free from disease and mental and physical vigor seemingly gave promise of years of life and usefulness.

These last were the circumstances under which he to whose memory we pay tribute to-day was called hence. On Sunday, January 11 last, THOMAS H. TONGUE, of Oregon, died suddenly at his residence in this city. Up to the very moment which proved fatal there were no outward signs of the fatal blow. Almost in an instant he had passed from this life to another. He was apparently in the very best of health only a day or two before, when I met him for the last time on this floor, attending to his official duties, in the performance of which he seemed ever to be so earnest and capable. Little did I then dream that within the short space of a few hours he would have crossed the mystic river that divides this from the unknown land which lies on the farther shore.

It was my good fortune to have known Mr. TONGUE from a date early in the Fifty-fifth Congress to the time of his death, and I can truthfully say that it has never been my fortune to meet one more earnest in the discharge of his duty, both to his immediate constituency and the country at large. He had many admirable traits, but that which to my mind distinguished him most as a legislator, and which no doubt contributed most to his success in other departments of life, making him, as he was, a man amongst men, was his intense earnestness and devotion to duty.

Whatever was worth doing was to him worth well doing, and if he had possessed nothing more to distinguish him here or elsewhere, if his fame and usefulness had no other foundation upon which to rest, the possession of this virtue alone would have sufficed to give him a high standing among his fellow-men. And after all, what one trait can more ennoble its possessor than devotion to duty, no matter what or where the field of human endeavor? It may lie in the humbler walks of life, in mercantile pursuits, or in the so-called learned professions, or yet in the legislative halls of the State or nation, where laws are made and policies outlined for the weal and happiness of the people; but whatever the vocation or pursuit, if the summit of hope is to be reached it must be through devotion to duty—in the doing well what one's hands find to do. This was the leading trait in the life and character of THOMAS H. TONGUE as I saw and understood him here.

But it was in the committee room, perhaps, where his best work was done as a national legislator. It was my good fortune to be with him on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, a committee whose labors touch more intimately and affect more directly the commercial growth and development of this country than all others. There projects are devised and appropriations recommended for the improvement of those rivers and harbors over which and through which our vast and growing commerce is carried by water, whether interstate or inward or outward bound. In dealing, as members of that committee have to deal, with the necessities of all sections of the country Mr. TONGUE showed a breadth of view and a profound comprehension of the commercial needs of the country that qualified him in every way for this great work. True, he never lost sight of his own State and people, but he labored likewise for the entire country, forgetting and ignoring State and district lines in his service in the committee room and on the floor of the House.

He and I differed in our political views, he belonging to one and I to the other of the two great parties of the country; but if I had waited to find out from social intercourse with him or from work in committee that this difference existed I should have ever remained in ignorance, perhaps, of his political opinions and sentiments, for he was not what is usually called a bitter partisan.

But he has gone from among us, Mr. Speaker, and others from time to time as the years go by will take the place occupied by him here, but the great State of Oregon will not find another more devoted to her interests or the country at large, one more earnest in his labors for her upbuilding than was he upon whose grave we lay these tributes of love and esteem to-day.

That was a fitting eulogy presented by the committee of which he had been so conspicuous a member on the morning following his untimely death. The members of that committee unanimously passed a resolution which, after expressing in the most earnest manner their sense of loss at the death of Mr. TONGUE, bore testimony to his great ability in this language:

As a member of this committee he was untiring in his efforts, and exhibited profound comprehension of the commercial necessities of our country. We recognize him as one who earnestly labored for his constituency and in a most patriotic way for his country. His genial companionship endeared him to all of us, and in his sudden death we feel a great personal loss. The State of Oregon and the country at large have lost a valuable, honest, and capable Representative.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that he is gone, but this is only true in a physical sense, for in the example his life has set and in the achievement he has made he is with us yet. The orb which cast its radiance about us has indeed gone down, but its luster still lingers to light the pathway of duty and endeavor.

The deeds men do live after them, and although our friend did not reach the end of life's allotted span and was cut down only a little beyond the point where the shadows turn toward the east, yet in achievement he had lived long and well.

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial
We should count time by heart throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Measured by this, the only true standard, his life was complete and well-rounded, his career crowned with success.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress will be long remembered by us as one of unusual fatality to its members.

The flag upon our Capitol floats only at half-mast when the Grim Reaper has laid his hand upon our fold. In the early days of my life as a member of this body it was a rare sight to see the flag at half-mast. But this winter as I have walked to and fro in my daily work I have seen the flag, like a mute emblem of the nation's mourning, outlined against the sky as if some unseen and almighty hand had nailed it to the half-mast.

It will cause us all to pause and think, we who are burning the oil out of life's lamp at such a tremendous rate, of the harvest we are reaping.

Mr. Speaker, on this sad occasion, when his colleagues are paying worthy tribute to the memory of our deceased brother, it was not my original intention to speak.

There is, however, a peculiar propriety in my adding a few words to-day to the volume of testimony that attests the esteem in which he was held by his associates in this body.

He and I both came to this Chamber from the mighty Northwest, from that region that was originally the Territory of Oregon.

Of that region and its vast resources and its possibilities no one had a clearer conception than the deceased. His beloved State of Oregon was the center of his universe. Not that I mean to say that he had not a broad and clear vision, for we all know to the contrary. But his credentials to this body charged him especially with the interest of that region and the welfare of that people. To him it was alike a sacred trust and a duty of love; and to its accomplishment he devoted himself with singleness of purpose and with unflagging energy.

The members of this body who represent Eastern constituencies, who reside in old and settled communities whose legislative wants are few, have little or no conception of the labors of the man who represents a comparatively new region, filled with mighty and diverse interests, with many vexed and unsettled problems, and with a restless, energetic, patriotic people. Their wants are as numberless as the sands of the seashore.

Such a region and such a constituency my friend represented in his lifetime, and we can all of us bear testimony to the willing way in which he bent his tired shoulders to that load. The coat of arms of his beloved State he seemed to have emblazoned on his heart. Whatever was for her best interests, whatever was for the greater welfare of his Commonwealth or the glory of her citizens, that he felt his self-appointed task to do.

I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion it was in a large measure his arduous labors that shortened his life.

Perhaps it is better thus. In this modern and enlightened age the lives of men, in the greater sense, are not spanned by years, but are measured by events. The sum total of a human life is properly measured by the good deeds accomplished and not by mere longevity.

Measured by this standard our friend will be long remembered by his associates on this floor.

But I dare say, sir, that the most enduring memory of him will not be with us, but will linger in the hearts of his people at home. In the bustle and whirl of our busy lives the figures come and go in our theater of action like the players on the stage. But away out yonder by his home, among the people he honored and who honored him, he will be remembered through the countless years to come by the legions of those whose burdens he helped to bear.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HON. JOHN N. W. RUMPLE.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions: The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House now proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN N. W. RUMPLE, late a Representative in the House from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate this resolution to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of this resolution to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, Capt. JOHN N. W. RUMPLE, whose life and services we commemorate to-day, was one of the men who has shed luster on the State of his birth and the State of his adoption. Born in Ohio, he moved West in 1853, and his man hood has been identified with the history of Iowa.

I have known him for thirty years, having first met him when he was a member of the Iowa senate. Captain RUMPLE was born near Fostoria, Ohio, March 4, 1841, on a farm. He died at St. Luke's Hospital, Chicago, Ill., January 31, 1903. His father died in 1844.

In 1853 the family emigrated to Iowa, settling in Iowa County upon a farm. Mr. RUMPLE was educated in the district school, in Ashland Academy, in Wapello County, Iowa; also in Western College, Linn County. He also took a course in the normal department of the State University. In acquiring his education he alternated between teaching school and attending the academy and college. On August 14, 1861, he enlisted as a private in Company H, Second Iowa Cavalry. He was promoted corporal, sergeant, lieutenant, and captain. He was discharged September 19, 1865, at Selma, Ala. He served with his gallant regiment in all of its campaigns, excepting from March 5, 1865, to August 31, 1865, when he was aid-de-camp on the staff of Brig. Gen. Edward Hatch.

In December, 1865, he began the study of law in the office of Hon. H. M. Martin, of Marengo, Iowa, with whom he afterwards became a partner. He was elected senator from his district in the adjourned session of the fourteenth general assembly to fill a vacancy. He was also a senator in the fifteenth and sixteenth general assemblies. He served on the board of regents of the Iowa State University, also as mayor and city solicitor to his town, Marengo, and as curator of the State Historical Society. In 1900 he was elected as a member of Congress from the Second district of Iowa, receiving 23,202 votes against 21,737 for his opponent, Hon. Henry Vollmer. Captain RUMPLE was for many years a member of the Masonic fraternity and the Grand Army of the Republic and a member of the Presbyterian Church. He was married December 6, 1866, to Miss Adaline K. Whitling. His wife dying, he contracted a second marriage with Miss Mary H. Shepard. Such is the brief outline of his life and public service. He was admitted to the bar in 1867, and though always active in public affairs, continued to practice with ability and success in his chosen profession. He has been long a prominent figure in the affairs of Iowa, and his friends at any time within the past thirty years have spoken of him as one who would some day be called to a seat in the Congress of the United States.

Many local circumstances delayed the fulfillment of this prophecy, until finally, in his sixtieth year, he was elected as a Republican in a district that had, from its organization, been normally and usually Democratic.

But when thus honored by his friends, and in the fulfillment of a worthy ambition he had taken his place in this honorable body, the insidious hand of a fatal disease was laid upon him.

His ship was wrecked in port, and he had only attained the reward of his well-deserved promotion when the summons came to prepare for that change which must come to all the living.

In the closing hours of this Congress we have been called many times to the realization that all men are mortal. Sixteen of our colleagues have solved the great problem that confronts us all.

It is therefore well that we should pause for an hour to think upon the life and example of this good and worthy man.

He left a good name, which is worth more than riches. A man's public career is only the surface of his life. The depths beneath are sounded only by his nearest friends.

One of his townsmen, in a recent letter to me, expressed his feelings in a few but earnest words:

All his neighbors believed in him, all trusted him, and our faith and confidence in him were never betrayed. And, best of all, we loved him.

The domestic life of our friend was a beautiful example to all who knew him well, and no man was ever more sincerely mourned by his neighbors. It is hard to part with these old friends.

We lose a life in every friend we lose,
And every death is painful but the last.

Mr. RUMPLE was loyal to his country and to his friends, and there was a charm in his personality that held to him for life those who once became acquainted with him.

The old soldiers of the nation had reason to be pleased when they learned that Speaker HENDERSON had assigned Captain RUMPLE to the arduous task of serving upon the Invalid Pension Committee of the House, for no comrade in arms or soldier's widow ever failed to secure his patient and friendly consideration.

Though apparently in the full vigor of a ripe manhood, and giving promise of many years of usefulness to his country, he had only thoroughly settled down to the hard work of his Congressional duty when the summons came to put his house in order for that change which must come to all living men.

We may with bated breath whisper to each other, "Who will be next?" And we know that we will not wait long for the answer.

Mr. Speaker, I also desire to print with my remarks an editorial by M. A. Raney, in the Republican, of Marengo, Iowa, whose estimate of Captain RUMPLE as a neighbor, a citizen, and a statesman is well worthy of a place in this day's proceedings.

HON. J. N. W. RUMPLE.

When Captain RUMPLE appeared on the streets of his home town for the last time in life, it was to exercise his privilege as an American citizen, and in the exercise of that franchise he performed the duty quietly but resolutely and as he fully believed to be right. Without ostentation, but as a citizen, he passed along the streets to the voting place, with a nod to one, a smile for another, a hand grasp and a refulgent friendliness for all that could be felt in its warmth, and then he returned to renew the dreary days of torture—a suffering that was not only severe and pain racking physically, but ached and throbbed in every nerve and tissue and almost drove to mental distraction. That its heritage was known to him there could be no doubt, a loving and idolized mother having succumbed to the same dread affliction. Yet throughout it all he never acknowledged, never weakened in his faith, never surrendered, but went down as he had fought, with a brave courage and heroic determination to win, but a terrible disease had fastened itself upon him and the fight between life and death continued unrelentless. The fading embers would from time to time be fanned into life's fitful flame, only to disclose at each recurring event, at least to his friends, the increasing weakness of his body. Ever patient and enduring, he suffered, he endured, but never complained. Trusting and hoping, although fully prepared for possible results and with every contingency arranged for, he lived on and on. In all the vicissitudes and battles of life even to the last he was brave as a hero but tender as a girl. His sense of right was great and beautiful; he loved justice, truth, and honor. His sympathies were easily and deeply touched by others' sorrows, and he was unselfish to a fault. From the depth of his heart he hated oppression, and his love went out like sweet showers to all his fellowmen.

At home and in Iowa County he lived in the hearts of his people as one whose steadfast firmness was proof against all changes and disaster. His career was not an accident, it was not the result of circumstances or chance. It had its origin in a strong, noble nature; its source was easily found in a great heart and head constantly working in harmony with pure methods for high purposes. His intellect was comprehensive, original, and contemplative. The every thought that came from it was broad, liberal, and exalted and of uniform character. Nothing eccentric, meteoric, or explosive emanated from that harmonious laboratory. Nothing was too grand or too vast for the grasp of his intelligence, nothing too minute or too trifling for his attention. His thought ever clear and discerning, his reason was bright and strong as steel. No clouds or mists, vapors or shadows, hovered over the straight lines of his march to conclusions. His arguments were constructed, doubtless, from lessons learned in military life. They were organizations strong, compact, without unnecessary ornament, always aggressive and dashing, and directly to the weak point for assault. He defended his flanks and rear by the vigor, boldness, and persistence of his charges. No saber was ever wielded more deftly on the field of battle than by him in the clean cut of the same weapon in argument. In debate he was happy, always able, well tempered, and candid, but perfectly fearless and just. He never inflicted a cowardly, cruel, or insidious wound, and left no rankling arrows in the memory of his opponents.

Possessed of a strong and graceful figure, an open, engaging countenance, an ambitious heart, he had that passion for enterprise and adventure which has ever been the quickening pulse of the pioneer. From plow to saber, from saber to school, from school to law book, then came the one additional step of hanging out his shingle as a poor and briefless barrister in Iowa County, where he had been raised, and almost in sight of the old Ohio Church, in Sumner Township, where his first Sunday-school lessons were well taught. Truly he was a man of the people, sprung from them, uplifted by them, and in all things true to them. In difficult situations he was no rash actor. Natural impetuosity was curbed by will and saving common sense. Thus he became a safe, wise adviser. Many there are who equaled or surpassed him in some one of many things, but few could do so many things so well, and rarer still are they who accomplished so much under such conditions as he dealt with. Young as measured by his years, yet old in experience and public service, he was stricken down in the prime of his manhood and usefulness as the sturdy oak is felled by the power of the mighty tempest.

At the time of success he was called away from a life full of promise to himself, and overflowing with fond hopes and realization for those who were nearest and dearest to him, and loved him with purest devotion. The loyal constituency of the Second district, to whose best interests he was wedded and tried so hard, although so terribly beset, to serve, are proud of his record as a statesman, but his friends dwell largest and with most pleasure upon the recollections had of him in his private life as an associate and companion. In closer sympathy and touch with the home citizens, understanding them better, and being by them fully understood and trusted, loved and respected, the loss is on every side felt to be a personal one, without regard to political affiliation and through all walks of life. Through the town and over the county the sad tidings of his death have gone, and all our people are in mourning. The heart swells in every bosom, and unbidden tears came to the eye as the citizen remembers the last warm grasp of the hand now forever stilled.

A truer or more earnest and sincere man never lived. He was a politician, yet a statesman of the highest order. Kind hearted and generous almost to a fault, yet always open to conviction, he was the same man at all times, amidst all surroundings and under all circumstances. Whether as an orphan boy and a laborer in the vineyard of daily toil to support his widowed mother and family, as a youthful soldier half starved and poorly clad, fighting for the right, as a young lawyer striving for success, as a representative of the people in the Iowa senate and in Congress, hewing out a way and blazing a road to prominence, and dealing blows in behalf of lighter burdens for the people, he has always been found true, honest, sincere, manly, and courageous. He was ever a companion, but always a man. His legal equipment was complete—learned in the intracacies of the law and parliamentary procedure, he maintained even in his brief career the high standing and well-deserved distinction he so ably won in his first Congressional term.

He will be mourned by all, but most by those who wore the bronze buttons and addressed him as comrade, for there his work was never done, the door never closed, the pocket never empty, as he once said in eulogizing a comrade: "Of all the emotions awakened by death none is more touching than those called up by the death of a comrade. They bring the battlefield again before you. The same sulphurous canopy is before you. The hum of the bullet, the whiz of the round shot, the shriek of the shell, the clash of sabers, and the shouts of the combatants again fill your ears. The tiresome march, the wearing wading of streams, the ruddy camp fire, the bubbling coffee, and the rude fare appear. You hear again old Army songs and stories, and are lulled to sleep by the piping of frogs, the music of crickets and katydids, or by the soft patter of the rain upon your shelter tent. Again you are upon picket, musket in hand, watchful and wary, on the muddy shore of the Rappahannock or beneath the soughing pines of the Wilderness. When a comrade dies, life itself seems to turn backward. You live once more in the stormy scenes of thirty years ago."

His nature was susceptible of great enjoyment; he loved outdoor recreation and was extremely fond of fishing, one of his greatest pleasures being a summer trip to the northern Iowa lakes, where in all its beauty, and free from office cares, he could enjoy with his friends the green fields, wild flowers, the beautiful harvest fields, and endless hours of fishing, the enjoyable features of a good catch being an event of many days' pleasant memories with him.

His mortal career has ended and his life work is done; the page is written and his friends sorrow, but with it comes the reflection that his was a work well performed. It might have been longer, but not greater. In a measure his ambition was accomplished, and, with the drapery of his couch about him, he laid down to rest. To the bereaved family it can be said that his love and fidelity to his fellow-man, exemplified in his public acts, will stand as a legacy greater than riches and more valuable than length of days.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, in this connection, for general leave to print, as there are those members of this House who have been unable to be present who desire to be accorded this privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for general leave to print. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Speaker, if human effort could arrest the messenger of death, our friends would never die. We exhaust every means within our power to stay the hand of the destroyer, but all in vain. We confess our helplessness to save by coming at a time like this to express our sorrow at the loss of a colleague and friend and to pay a fitting tribute to his memory. We may strew flowers upon his grave and utter words of praise and commendation of his noble life and deeds, but can not call him back to earth again.

When a good man dies not only his family and friends suffer loss, but his country as well. The wealth of a nation does not consist alone in its property and natural resources, but also in the character and nobility of its citizens. Its strength and stability do not depend so much upon its armies and navies as upon the honor, virtue, and intelligence of its citizens. In the death of Mr. RUMPLE his family and friends suffer an irreparable loss. His death means more to them than a vacant chair—more than the absence of a familiar face and form. It means that husband and father, a tower of strength for loved ones to lean upon, is removed. His prostrate form will never rise again. The kindly eye that drew men unto him has been closed for all time. The lips that whispered love and encouragement are sealed forever. The ear that never failed to hear the cry of distress is deaf forevermore. The voice, rich and musical in tone, will never be heard again on earth. The heart whose every pulsation was for those he loved will never throb again. Time and reflection will but emphasize the loss which his loved ones have sustained. But in a broader sense he will be missed. The community in which he lived, and also his State and nation, will miss him. He was a factor in the affairs of his city, county, State, and nation.

He was essentially a self-made man. He was born and reared upon the farm. When a mere child his father departed this life. The death of his father forced upon him responsibilities which otherwise would not have come. He moved with his mother from Ohio to his adopted State—the State of Iowa—when still a child, though older than the State to which he moved. In the sparsely settled section of the State where he located there were few chances for education and improvement. He took advantage of opportunities afforded him and attended first the district school and then the college. It was during this latter experience in the early sixties that he heard the call to arms to save the Union from dissolution. He enlisted before he had attained his majority, and during the four years and more that he was in the service he made for himself a brilliant record. He rose from the ranks to the position of captain. It is said that he was engaged in more than 30 battles during the rebellion. He earned for himself an enviable reputation for brave and courageous conduct.

He came home from the war when it was over not spoiled by his laurels and immediately set about to complete his education and to take up his work where he had left it when he enlisted. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, entered upon the practice of his profession, and became an honored member of it. His ability was soon recognized, and he was called to serve his State. He was repeatedly elected to the office of State senator, and was a safe and conservative legislator. He filled other positions of trust and responsibility.

During all these years he was preparing himself for higher responsibilities, and the time came when the people of his Congressional district said he was the right man to send to Congress. Public opinion centered upon him, and he was nominated and triumphantly elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress. I have no doubt that if his health had permitted he would have remained in Congress for an indefinite time, because his services and abilities were such that his constituents would have been proud to have kept him here. But the disease that had fastened itself upon him made such progress that he was compelled to say to the people of his district that he could not accept the nomination to the Fifty-eighth Congress.

It is not within our power to utter words that can bring comfort to a stricken wife at a time like this. We can but point to the splendid career of her husband, to his record as a citizen, soldier, and statesman.

We can say to her that while he has passed from sight, he still lives in memory, and that the influence of his life will continue a vital force in making the world better and adding something to its happiness.

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
To shine for evermore.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, it seems as though death delights in violating and in breaking the conventional terms and periods established by governments and men. If JOHN N. W. RUMPLE had lived until one week from Thursday next, he would have been exactly 62 years of age. But the most dreadful of all diseases would not grant a truce even for a single month.

Birth, which sometimes seems agreeable to the institutions and establishments of mankind, had brought into our needy world this noble soul exactly 60 years before his Congressional term began, March 4, 1901. If I mistake not, his was the sixteenth removal by death from the Fifty-seventh Congress, the greatest mortality rate in the last decade of Congresses, and, for aught I know, in the history of Congresses—about 3¼ per cent.

But fractions in mortality amount to little, except to actuaries, since all must die eventually. We are concerned not so much about the days and years, but about the character and loss of this useful man.

Like hundreds of our citizens of Iowa, he came from the Buckeye State—a transplanting which was always sympathetic. Like the majority of our young men, he sought a thorough education at our institutions, and like thousands of others, when the awful storm arose, "wrenching the rafters from their ancient hold," he went forth in battle for the nation and stayed until the scattered stars of States were brought again into the constellation of the Union. He earned the rank of captain in the famous Second Cavalry of Iowa in such battles as Island No. 10, siege of Corinth and Rienzi, charges at Farmington, Iuka, Corinth, Franklin, Columbia, and Nashville, and many others.

Like most good soldiers, he became a model citizen. The jar of war usually awakens reason and mollifies the prejudice of men. Whoever has experienced great danger, either to his country or to himself, naturally becomes a counselor for safety and a conservator of peace. He is likewise firm in the face of fraud and bluster, for he knows the limitations of those who have not felt hardship and who have not faced death.

Like hundreds and thousands of others who came out of the awful storm of the early sixties, Captain RUMPLE became a useful and influential factor in his community and State. His tendencies were with mankind in the long run. He builded for the future without swerving to sensation or sacrificing his convictions. He became prominent at the bar and in the legislation of our State, likewise as a regent of our university and in the State Historical Society, meanwhile giving his good counsel in matters of municipal and educational affairs at home. He served with honor and fidelity in the Fifty-seventh Congress nearly to its end, which we are now approaching.

Just in the prime of life, when maturity, sharpened and well tempered by experience, with all the joys and sorrows of a vigorous career, with conflict and with hardship, with love and labor and success, that sable figure of the night which flits but once across the path of man, and always once, far out along his straight and noble path, unmasked and unrelenting, stood plainly there before him. As steady and unfalteringly as ever warrior went to meet a foe, as humbly and resignedly as a good man ever met his God, this soldier citizen, this friend, this man, went on.

Mr. HEDGE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me proper that on this birthday of Washington we should contemplate the career and character of the men, strong, high-minded men, who, in these late days, have constituted the State, the country, of which we call him father. From what has already been said, it is plain that our late companion was one of those to whom it was given to move in and to illustrate the heroic age of America. As we read between the lines of his brief biography we see that he was a high example of the American soldier. His life afterwards showed that this soldier boy, this Captain RUMPLE, felt that as his obligation to his country did not have its source or its beginning in his oath of service, so it did not have its end or fulfillment in his parchment discharge. As has just been said, as a citizen he perceived his duty through all these forty years of manifold labors and trusts confided in him by his neighbors, and always performed that duty without parade and without reserve.

I first met him casually when he was a member of our State senate, a man already enjoying the confidence and esteem of all the people of his State. Afterwards he removed to the town in which I lived, and practiced law and made himself known at once as a high-minded lawyer, industrious, faithful to the interests of his clients, faithful to the cause of justice, fair and square and, therefore, with his intelligence and his industry, a dangerous antagonist. We have not time, nor is it necessary, to go over the different stages of this good life. We know that his people at home, through all these years, from his boyhood to his mature age, believed in him, trusted him, and loved him. I saw him last in July, last summer, when he must have known, as the rest of us knew, that the sentence of death had been passed upon him. Serenely, bravely, and cheerfully he passed through these months of trial, these hours of agony, concealing the trouble within him, the mainstay and support of his family and friends until the very end. He is gone. We shall have no more the comfort of his personal presence or of his kindly ways; but the memory and example of that gentle life, of that high service, of that pure character shall be a precious possession and inspiring influence to all who knew him, as long as human affection and human memory shall endure.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, on his last journey through the Commonwealth of Iowa, in which President McKinley gave forth any public utterance, he said that "duty disregarded brings shame more hard to bear than any burden that duty can put upon us." That Congressman RUMPLE was a man of patriotism and of courage is evidenced by the history of his country, which records more than four years of service in the Union Army, in which, without the aid of influence other than his own fidelity, he fought his way up from a private to a captain in one of the most gallant regiments enlisted in the civil war. That he was a man and a lawyer of ability is evidenced by the fact that he stood at the head of the bar of his locality for more than thirty years, where he had no mean antagonists to meet.

That he was a man of simple piety is evidenced by the long service he rendered to the humble church at his home, and by the life he led, consistent with that service. That he was a good neighbor and a good man is evidenced by the general and profound sorrow that was everywhere displayed in the home where he had lived so long over the news of his death. That he was a kind and loving husband and father is attested by the profound grief displayed by the wife and daughter he was compelled to leave behind.

The overshadowing characteristic of Captain RUMPLE was his fidelity to duty. Nearly a year ago, when the malady which caused his death first made its appearance, many of his most devoted friends pleaded with him to abandon the discharge of his duties here, that he might receive proper treatment, and perchance preserve his strength and his life for the discharge of duties yet to come. But he insisted that certain duties rested upon him here, which he must discharge before he could leave this city for that treatment which should have been promptly given if it was to avail at all. He remained, and remained too long. The malady became so fastened upon him that medical skill could do nothing for him; and he then calmly and courageously met death, in the supreme faith that He who cooled the furnace and smoothed the stormy wave—

And tamed the Chaldean lions is mighty still to save.

At the birth of our religion, when the faithful looked for the early second coming of our Lord, men were content to believe in a resurrection deferred until that coming; but the lapse of twenty centuries has not been without its effect upon the faith and the belief of devout men everywhere. And many now believe, as I believe, that the very hour of death is the morning of the resurrection, and that this dear old friend has already received that reward which is due to duty well performed.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled here to-day to pay a last loving tribute to the memory of our departed friend and fellow-member, JOHN N. W. RUMPLE, who has passed over the dark river and now rests under the trees on the other side.

Did I say a "last" tribute? It may be our last official and formal tribute, but it will not be the last time that our hearts throb with grief or our memories kindle with kindly emotions within us at the thought or mention of his name.

We gather here with uncovered heads and sad hearts as we reflect how short a time has elapsed since he sat among us in this Hall, but that to-day he is with the unnumbered hosts who have gone on to their reward.

Though young in Congressional experience, Mr. RUMPLE had already given ample proof of statesmanlike ability and promise of a long and useful legislative career. He was still in the prime of life, and when we see such a man stricken down suddenly at the outset of an honorable and valuable service in the national councils we can only bow before the unknowable in deep humility of spirit and acknowledge that the best, the bravest, and the strongest of us are but as chaff before the whirlwind. "God works in a mysterious way His wonders to perform," and while we can not now understand the decrees of His divine providence, we must believe that "He doeth all things well."

My acquaintance with Mr. RUMPLE began only with the beginning of the present Congress, but even in that short time it soon ripened into warm friendship. My experience in this respect was that of many others among us. Mr. RUMPLE's character and disposition were such that he naturally attracted to himself the love and confidence of his fellow-men. He was one of that sterling type of men, alas, all too rare, who are true as steel and of brilliant capabilities, but yet modest and unassuming and void of self-conceit and self-seeking. The record of his life bespeaks his character. We see him, as a boy, striving diligently to get an education, yet leaving his university at the call of duty and entering the Union Army as a private soldier, and no man in all that mighty host did his full duty more nobly. His name is not inscribed high up on the roll of famous generals or admirals, but he was one of the bravest and most efficient of those hundreds of thousands of "boys in blue" who really fought and won the battles for the North, and without whom the famous generals would have had no fame to win. He served all through the dreadful four years of the civil war, fought in more than thirty battles, including Corinth, Iuka, New Madrid, Island No. 10, Farmington, Tupelo, Columbia, Franklin, and Nashville, and was mustered out at the end of the war with the rank of captain, which he had richly won by his long, devoted, and gallant service in the field.

After the surrender, Captain RUMPLE was stationed for a while at Selma, Ala., with Grierson's Raiders, and he always seemed to enjoy telling me his reminiscences and experiences in the South. He spoke in the highest terms of the people of the South, and evidently entertained the warmest regard and kindliest feeling for the old ex-Confederate soldiers whom he had so often faced in deadly combat. He was one of the members of the House whom I invited to go South with me on the trip of last May for the purpose of studying the negro question, and he was sorely disappointed because circumstances prevented him from joining the party. Notwithstanding the fact that he had waged constant warfare against the Confederate Army for four years, and had been exposed to the fire of that army in more than thirty battles, he respected the South and had become a good friend of the South, and, like the true patriot and broad-minded citizen that he was, he had laid aside all hostile sectional feeling.

After the war we see Mr. RUMPLE settling down at once into the ranks of useful, industrious private citizens. He resumed his interrupted studies, adopted the legal profession, and by sheer force of merit and industry worked his way up into a good practice and a good standing in his community. Though seeking no honors or preferments, many came to him unsought. He was often elected to the Iowa State senate and had held many municipal offices, including the mayoralty in his own city; and at last he was chosen by his district to represent it at the nation's capital.

Is it not true, Mr. Speaker, that such a career as this is the nearest in accord with the ideally successful life? It does not include the gaining of a Rothschild's wealth or a Napoleon's renown, but it does include the gaining of the esteem and preference of a whole community; it does include the winning of the love and respect of all acquaintances; it does include the record of having braved death for the sake of the general welfare, and of having done the State much valuable service; and a man with such a record must be deemed truly great as well as good. But now, alas!

He is gone who seemed so great,
Gone; but nothing can bereave him
Of the force he made his own
Being here, and we believe him
Something far advanced in state,
And that he wears a truer crown
Than any wreath that man can weave him.

The affection which Mr. RUMPLE inspired was his by natural right, for he was gentle and friendly in spirit and made friends easily and naturally. As we all know, he was highly esteemed by his colleagues from his own State, and was regarded by them as a man of excellent judgment. He fully justified here the confidence which his constituents had placed in him, for he looked closely after the interests of the people whom he represented and watched with jealous care every commission intrusted to him.

Mr. RUMPLE had for some time suffered from a malady which he seemed to recognize as incurable, but he bore this affliction with marked fortitude and patience. He was a devoted husband and father. In his death the members of his family have suffered an irreparable loss. I myself have lost a friend whose friendship I cherished, and the great State of Iowa has been deprived of the services of one of her best citizens and ablest Representatives.

How true it is, Mr. Speaker, that if one wishes to find out what kind of a man a man is one must find out what his family, his friends, and his acquaintances think of him. A good man may have a few enemies through their spite or envy, but a bad man, or a weak man, or a cold, selfish man can not have the love and esteem of a whole community in general. And as I pay this heartfelt tribute to the memory of this good man and dear friend I mourn his loss as a personal grief, and I sympathize deeply with those who loved him as husband, father, and neighbor.

Surely, "in the midst of life we are in death;" and since the grim monster has visited our body so frequently during this Congress, we are forcibly reminded that—

Death's but a path that must be trod,
If man would ever pass to God.

Yes, sixteen of our number have been called to answer the summons of death; and while we can not but be saddened by these frequent and inscrutable dispensations of God's providence, we bow in humble submission to His divine will, believing that He "loveth whom He chasteneth."

In bidding a last, long farewell to Mr. RUMPLE we perform a labor of love and take formal notice of a life well spent for the good of his fellow-men and for the honor and glory of his country. As a friend he was sincere; as an associate, pleasant, generous, and affable; as a worker, serious, diligent, and devoted to duty. He was truly a representative of the people and labored unceasingly for their interests. May we strive to emulate the noble traits of his character and to perpetuate the good deeds which he delighted in doing for his fellow-men. Thus may it prove to us all, as it surely has to him, that "death is the crown of life," and that "the King of Terrors is the Prince of Peace." Thus may we all be enabled to realize in the fullness of time that—

There is no death! What seems so is transition.
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call death.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, on this sad occasion it is fitting that I should offer a few observations on the life and character of my beloved and greatly admired colleague, Captain RUMPLE. It was my privilege and pleasure to know him for a number of years, and to know him more intimately during his short stay here in Washington, where our duties brought us in frequent and friendly contact.

I believe I voice the sentiment of every member of this House, as well as the sentiment of his constituents and all who knew him, when I say that he was a man of unusually high character, sterling qualities, loving disposition, eminently sociable, pleasant, courteous, obliging, talented, endowed with lofty ideals and purposes, with untiring energy, always conscientious, attentive to his duties, loyal to his friends, and with a firm determination to do justice to all.

I have observed closely his faithful and efficient work here in this House and the committees, especially the Committee on Invalid Pensions, a committee which all of us have occasion to visit probably more than any other. The appointment of Captain RUMPLE to this important committee was in itself a tribute to his worth and was indeed a wise selection. In him the old soldiers had a faithful and warm friend. In this committee he labored diligently early and late with his colleagues; as I am informed, they many times worked into the early hours of morning. The interests of the old soldiers and the Government were carefully and judiciously guarded. His unceasing efforts were to have pensions granted on their merits; his pride was to legislate so as to maintain the pension roll as a roll of honor. He himself had given four years and three months of the best years of his life in the service of his country. He was one of those who crossed that fearful wilderness of war, fighting for the preservation of the Union and that peace, happiness, and liberty might prevail; one of those many men who so cheerfully responded to the call when the destiny of this country was trembling in the balance, inspired by the noble and glorious idea that liberty should be universal. He was thus in a position to appreciate the heroic deeds of those gallant men who brought so much fame to America, as well as the noble sacrifices which have been made.

Believing as he did in a just recognition of the services of our soldiers and sailors, he earnestly labored to secure liberal pensions and pension laws for the worthy and disabled survivors, and for their widows and orphans, and for the dispensation of pensions—volunteer offerings—which this great, grand, and grateful country of ours bestows upon those who have rendered valuable service and who have made sacrifices, and for a just recognition of the spirit of patriotism with which they served—a testimony and appreciation of the value of their eminent services, rendered their country during dark and direful hours.

He was a man who loved and fought for liberty and to the bottom of his heart hated oppression and bondage; a noble specimen of manhood, beloved, admired, and commanding the respect of all who knew him; one kindly and lovingly disposed; one who always worked earnestly and faithfully to fulfill the duties incumbent upon him, and one who so honorably and gloriously succeeded.

Modestly and unassumingly he went along, quietly attending to his public duties, wasting no time in trying to make himself conspicuous. He was a man of action more than words; not an orator, though a forcible, logical, and convincing speaker. Instead of trying to rise above the people he, as our greatest statesmen have done, remained on the common level.

From boyhood his life was pure and stainless, rising from the humble walks of life to a high position socially, politically, and professionally. Such results could have been attained only by fidelity to duty and unfaltering faith in rectitude of purpose dominated by the loftiest and noblest ideals. It was impossible to know this talented man without observing his noble and loving disposition—knowing him, it was impossible not to become attached to him, to love him and be inspired with the fullest confidence and respect for his noble characteristics.

He was a man of integrity, sound judgment, wise, broad minded, liberal, and exalted. A truer, more energetic, earnest, and sincere man never lived.

His character, his success, his record, both private and public, is an open book without a stain of immorality, deception, fraud, or corruption. His loyalty to principle, his devotion to truth, his untiring energy, his lofty and noble ideals, and conscientious work enabled him to attain and hold the position which he occupied in the thoughts, esteem, and affections of his countrymen, enjoying and deserving the confidence and respect of all, and always pursuing his duty with fidelity and a determination to do justice, and ever a firm believer and advocate of sincerity, honesty, integrity, justice, equality, conscientious dealings, purity of heart, thought, and action.

In his Christian home he was a devoted and kind husband, an affectionate father, a friendly and obliging neighbor. In Captain RUMPLE we find a very interesting and remarkable career. Born in Ohio in 1841, settling in his early manhood in Iowa on a farm, pluckily, energetically, and vigorously pursuing his education, next we see him a teacher, a soldier in the Union Army, always true, loyal, and brave, where he saw much service and engaged in many battles; an eminent lawyer, for many years serving in the legislative halls of his own State, where he distinguished himself as a statesman and trusted servant of the people. His next honor was his election to Congress, where we can all testify to his ability and fidelity.

In his short career here he acquired a large circle of devoted friends and admirers. His death causes sincere and profound regret to all. He died in the full maturity of his mental vigor. Truly it can be said that his life was well spent and full of good deeds. He died at a time when his life, character, his example, sound judgment, and wisdom were of the greatest value to his country.

In him we have an example of the self-made man to the fullest extent of its meaning. And what a splendid example; what an incentive to all. If one is to succeed in life, either public or private, it must be by fidelity to duty, cherishing noble and lofty ideals, with an unfaltering faith in rectitude of purpose, with a firm determination to do right and justice; and our guiding star should ever be sincerity, honesty, integrity, justice, equality, conscientious dealings, purity of heart, thought, and action, denouncing and shunning deceit and conceit.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of joining with my associates of the House in paying tribute to the life and character of our friend, Captain RUMPLE, of Iowa, who has recently been called away from our midst.

Captain RUMPLE belonged to that earnest, quiet, and unostentatious class of men who move along among their fellows, performing the duties that devolve upon them in a modest and unassuming manner, almost unobserved by those with whom they associate. He was not one of those who was ever exploiting his own importance or boasting his accomplishments, as do some we meet with in the course of everyday life. He was a quiet man, yet he never undertook anything in a weak-hearted manner. With him there was a sensitive cord drawing the line between right and wrong, and, always led onward by a motive to do right, his actions in the present were directed by a steadfast hope in the future. There are those, and I think that Captain RUMPLE may well be said to have been one of them, who are never disturbed by the past, except as it may serve to furnish lessons for the future—who perform the duties of the day as they come along, molding them for the future.

It is not that class of men that attracts the notice and receives the plaudits of the passers-by in immediate approbation of their exploits, to be forgotten when the procession has passed; but when their sturdy and earnest life is rounded up we see their influence impressed upon the things with which they were brought in close relation. It is this character of men that makes the world better and happier for their having lived in it.

Mr. RUMPLE was born and reared on the farm, receiving such advantages in the way of education, while on the farm, as could be given to farmers' boys generally who possess the intelligence, energy, and grit to make proper application of the opportunities that arise from poverty and from breathing the healthful atmosphere and engaging in the invigorating exercises of farm life. His boyhood surroundings were modest and frugal, but they taught him those lessons of honesty, economy, integrity, and industry that characterized his entire course during his after life. It is from this class, surrounded by such influences, that have arisen the men and women who have left their impress upon our institutions.

It is from this class, and surrounded by like influences, that have come those who have made our nation famous in the fields of statesmanship, finance, literature, and art. The wholesome influences that surround farm life give to the farmer's boy life and soul, inspired with energy and courage, to go out into the world and successfully engage with the forces that lie in the road to success. Nowhere is that freedom of thought and freedom of action as clearly displayed to the young mind as on the farm, where every ripple of the stream, every song of the bird, every sighing of the breeze, every lowing of the herd, is an inspiration to the young mind and an incentive to good citizenship and love of country. A gentle spirit, a pure heart, and active mind, fanned and fed by an invigorating atmosphere, grow and expand in the full development of man and in the broadening of an exalted manhood. These were the influences that surrounded Captain RUMPLE during his boyhood days and as he grew into the state of manhood. These were the influences that inspired him with a love of home and home life, and at the same time filled his soul with a patriotic love of country.

The firing on Fort Sumter was not only the signal of secession. It was, in a more significant sense, the liberation of Northern thought. It, at once, concentrated the minds of the people on the fact that we have an American Union, and that, as emblematical of that Union, an American flag, and that the Union had been attacked and its emblem torn down. The thought of the American people both North and South had been centered on the question of slavery, but as the reverberation of the discharge of the first gun was heard, the fact that the paramount question now before the American people was not slavery in itself, but the American Union, dawned upon the people and filled their minds with alarm. Imbued with this idea and impressed with the importance to mankind of maintaining the Union unbroken and unimpaired, the young men of the country, with patriotic fervor, responded to the nation's call for troops.

Mr. RUMPLE enlisted in the Army for the Union, and remained in the service for more than four years, and was among the last of that great Army to be mustered out after the close of the war. For valiant and faithful service he was promoted from his position of enlistment as a private, through the several gradations of office, to that of captain, which position he held at the time of his discharge. His was not a service of ease or idleness. He was under General Grant at Vicksburg and under Thomas at Franklin and Nashville, Tenn., and whether on the march to Jackson, Miss., and at the capture of that place, or in the several battles on the countermarch, or in the trenches around Vicksburg, or whether engaged in the battles of Franklin and Nashville, or in pursuit of General Hood, he always manifested that deliberate courage and unshrinking fidelity to duty that formed the guiding star to his whole life.

He was not led to enlist in the Army through any hope of ease or comfort nor from any thought of military preferment, but solely out of a sense of duty under the inspiration of patriotism and love of country. While he spent more than four years in the service, it was not because that service had any attractions congenial to his nature, but because he felt it a duty as an American citizen to maintain the integrity of the Union and to protect the honor of the American flag.

When the Union was restored, the Army discharged, and his military labors ended, he again returned to civil life, took up the study of law, was admitted to practice, and became prominent as one of the principal lawyers of the State of his adoption. Afterwards, he was elected to the legislature of the State of Iowa, of which he became a distinguished member, finally closing his career as a Representative in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

One thing may always be said of Captain RUMPLE—that a sense of duty was his guiding star through his entire life. Wherever that pointed, he was found. Whether on the farm as a boy, when growing into manhood; whether in the public schools or college; whether in the Army, in camp, or on the march, or on the field of battle; whether in the court room or in the legislative chamber, or whether in social relations with his family or friends, he was ever found actuated by the same motive.

There is no place, perhaps, where true character is more accurately reflected than in the home. The close relationship in the family circle is very sure in time to develop character in its true light and in its proper relations. With Captain RUMPLE the home, with its influences and the comforts that it afforded, was the place of his delights, and here he enjoyed the companionship of his friends with a generous cordiality.

With the last session of Congress Mr. RUMPLE was compelled to close his public career. Before the close of the session he felt that grim disease coming on that finally took him away. But he did not lose hope or courage. We saw him here attending to his official duties, looking after the interests of his constituents, attending to those matters that are required of a faithful member of this House, long after he began to feel that a prudent regard for his physical condition demanded that he cease his labors here and seek medical treatment for the disease that had begun to make its appearance and was beginning to undermine his vitality and endanger life itself. When this consideration was pressing upon him, I heard him, on several occasions, express a purpose and desire to get away to receive medical treatment; but this was always coupled with the idea, as expressed by him, that he still had this to do and that to look after before he felt warranted to leave his duties here. And so matters went on until nearly the close of the session before he left here and went to the hospital at Indianapolis, where he was soon made acquainted with the malignant character of the disease whose fangs had pierced his very life.

Now, for the first time, he realized in its full sense the seriousness of his condition, and, supported by the consciousness of a pure and upright course of living and buoyed up by the hopes of achievements to be accomplished in the future, he took up the contest for life while death seemed apparent, most manfully and with devout Christian courage. But courage must sometimes yield, and when that yielding is manifested in a loving, Christian faith, it is the mere transition from courage to resignation; and the spirit that can yield gracefully to the inevitable when the time comes will reflect its light and influence to be witnessed by those who follow after.

It soon became apparent that the disease with which Mr. RUMPLE was afflicted was of a malignant type, and that it was daily penetrating deeper and deeper and fastening its fangs upon the life that remained. With a consciousness of the approaching end he awaited its coming with a Christian fortitude only to be sustained by the hope of immortality and a faith in an ever-living God. His was a noble life, filled with deeds of love and charity and kindness, and as it went out loving friendship followed with earnest prayer.

I feel constrained to believe that in some cases, even where the whole course of life is filled with love and kindness, the sublimity of character is more vividly reflected in sickness and death and in the scenes that attend them, without murmur and without complaint, than in life itself. That patient endurance, with the consciousness ever present that the end of all that pertains to this world is fast approaching, without the hope of relief except in death, portrays a character of sublime beauty.

The life of everyone, whether it may be drawn on right lines or wrong, when it goes out, leaves its impress and influence somewhere. Some heart is touched and some chord made to thrill by it. The influence of that life does not always stop with the grave, but it goes on and enters into the lives of those that are to come. This thought is found portrayed in the life of Captain RUMPLE. He embodied in his everyday life the sentiment expressed so beautifully in the lines of the poet:

So live that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt on this occasion any eulogy of our deceased friend or attempt any analysis of his life and character. I come only as a comrade of my comrade, to bring one more tribute to his memory.

I never knew him until I met him first in this Congress as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The few months' service we had together on that committee revealed his personal character to me by reason of our daily contact in the consideration of the same questions. Kinship of service in the same cause was supplemented by kinship of faith in the same Saviour and the same hope of eternal life. He endeared himself to me by his unfailing kindness and gentleness. I never heard a petulant word from him or a word of complaint concerning the arduous duties to which he was called or the perplexing questions that were presented to him.

I never heard any complaint from him concerning the things that sometimes have offended us all—the procedure and rules of the House. I have heard him occasionally say, with reference to some important measure, "I desired to speak, but somehow or other the duties of my committee do not leave me time for the preparation which I feel is due." And then he would go back to his committee room to resume the work to which he had been assigned. I knew nothing about his home life. It so happened that in our intercourse there had not been occasion to speak of it except in an incidental way. Yet every time it was mentioned by him it revealed the tenderness of the associations that were there. I did not know the people from whom he came or amongst whom he had spent his life; and it was not until after his death that I knew enough of his personal history to even say more about him than his record in the Congressional Directory showed.

But the inquiry made since discloses a life with the characteristics of the sons of liberty in liberty's land. Born on a farm, he was fatherless at the age of 11. At 13 driving a team and moving his widowed mother and her little children from the center of Ohio to a new home in the State of Iowa. That was nearly fifty years ago. We can picture to ourselves the long journey and the sturdy character that was daily growing in the life of the boy. At 16 a pupil in the district school of his community; at 18 a teacher in the same school; at 20 years and 4 months, enlisting as a private soldier in one of the first regiments organized in his State, and going out to the battlefield to contend about questions of life and death for the nation into which he had been born. The generation that did that is but a remnant now. As one after another the comrades fall from our side we drop our tribute, our sprig of evergreen, into the grave, an emblem of the immortality in which we hope; and then we side step to the right and the left, closing on the center, each step bringing us a little nearer to the flag and to the standard of life by which we live and by which the nation bears onward its life.

Four years of service for a boy like that! He came out a captain at the age of 24. I will not stop to repeat the great military history which was written during that time. The very names of the battlefields which have been enumerated before you testify to the character of it all; and immediately, without seeking honor at the hands of the nation he had helped to save, he turned himself to the duties of life. We next find him as a student of law. Then, after the usual time, he was admitted a member of the bar and immediately began the practice of his profession. The rest of his life was spent in the community where he was a schoolboy and where he was a law student. His neighbors testified to their appreciation of him as a man by electing him to Congress. Yet he did not appear at any time conscious of bearing honor. Certainly he was always unconscious that he was seeking honor. So delicate is that rare flower that "he who seeks it shall never find it, and he who finds it needs no name." He has gone before.

I miss the kindly light of his eye, the gentle touch of his hand, and the cheerful voice. Somehow I can not feel the sense of grief which is commonly expressed concerning the loss of a man or a friend. I feel the sense of separation, and yet I feel conscious that somewhere on the other shore such a man is looking back at the record of a life in which there may have been mistakes that even his fellow-men have forgotten, looking back upon the record of a life in which the highest motive was to endeavor to do his duty as it was laid upon him. Trained from childhood in that stern old faith that has given Christian civilization so many men of clear intellect and generous, warm hearts, his character had in it the repose which comes from reliance upon "the impregnable rock of the Scriptures." The logic of the shorter catechism decided for him the fundamental elements of justice and of right. There were never two sides to a question before him. It was always, What is right?

Returning back to this House after my absence during vacation, I passed through the city of Chicago and arrived here the day of his death. I did not know that he was then languishing in a hospital in that city, or else I should have stopped and gone again to stand beside him as he went down to the portals that mark the end of life. He endeared himself to me, and it was with more than a feeling of mere comradeship; it was with that fraternal feeling which sometimes ties our lives together without our knowing why or how. Since I knew that this day had been set aside for addresses in his memory, I wrote to one of his friends at his home, asking a question pertaining to him. In reply I received the following answer, which I will read as worthy of a place in the RECORD:

MARENGO, IOWA, February 18, 1903.

Hon. W. A. CALDERHEAD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 15th instant received this morning, too late, I fear, to get to you the papers I mail to your address to-day by Friday. The papers referred to contain Mr. RUMPLE's record quite fully.

It was my privilege to office with him six years, having desk room with him. A warm friendship grew out of this close association, one for the other. He would have reached his sixty-second year had he lived until March 4. My acquaintance with him covered twenty-five years. I was with him at the Cedar Rapids Congressional convention twenty years ago, when he made his first effort to gain a nomination for Congress, where Hon. James Wilson, now Secretary of Agriculture, won out by one majority over him. No citizen of this city or of the State ever left a cleaner or more honorable record than RUMPLE. He loved to live, and made a gallant fight for life. His friendships were many and close, and he had the reputation of standing loyally by his friends.

While he lived plainly and was temperate in all things, he accumulated but little. He was most liberal in his dealings, always a contributor to all good and worthy objects. He often said to me that he might be more properly designated as a compromiser of difficulties between men than an attorney. By and through his disposition and habit of settling litigation outside of court he missed many a fat fee. I was a witness to many such settlements in his office. But when he once landed a case in court he was one of the hardest fighters during these years among the members of the bar of this part of the State.

He was an active member of the Presbyterian Church, for years leader of the choir.

He was married twice, a daughter by his first wife, a widow for several years, making her home with him. A son by his second wife died about twenty-five years ago. He had a very pleasant and comfortable little home, only recently built.

Mr. RUMPLE was never active in his own behalf for political advancement. It was the spontaneous and zealous work of his friends which made his advancement possible. In the last campaign for Congress no movement was ever made by him for such nomination. Every move, from start to finish, was made without his knowledge or consent by his friends in Iowa County, reinforced by friends in every county in the district.

The people's faith and confidence in his honesty and sincerity of purpose was fixed and substantial. His friendship was not limited to any particular class, but he was as easily approached by the most humble and unfortunate citizen as those occupying opposite positions in business or society. JOHN RUMPLE was everybody's friend, is about the simplest form of stating it.

With my kindest personal regards, I am, very truly, yours,

D. M. ROWLAND.

As we measure the lives of our colleagues who have passed on from us, we do more than pay tribute to them. We lay binding upon ourselves obligations to the highest performance of duty; and the life and example and friendship of my comrade binds me to further efforts, that I may in some way yet meet his approval and meet the approval of the Great Master.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MOODY OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina offers the resolutions which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of North Carolina.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Speaker, JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY was my warm personal friend. I had known him for many years, and our friendship dated from our first acquaintance. We differed widely in politics, but it is a pleasure now to recollect that our personal relations were never affected thereby. He was a true son of North Carolina, and his heart was big, like the mountains at whose base he was born and reared and buried.

No man in a single term in Congress ever acquired more general esteem and confidence than he.

Never noisy or demonstrative, but always courteous, obliging, indefatigable, intelligent, he compelled the good will of his associates and accomplished much for his constituents.

So lately did he move among us in apparent health and strength it is hard to realize that, in the very maturity of his powers, he has gone from us to join the silent "democracy of the dead." Few who met him in his last days of service here knew that he was bearing about with him, consciously, yet bravely and silently, the almost certainty of his speedy outgoing. Loyal to his own, he went home to die.

Born February 12, 1858, he was not yet 45 years of age, yet in the brief span of his life he had filled many positions of trust, and always with honor.

As prosecuting attorney for his judicial district, as State senator, as major and division commissary in the Spanish-American war, and latterly as a Representative in this House he had worn all honors worthily and well. Simple in his habits, unostentatious in his manner, genial in his address, candid, and yet considerate of the feelings of all, he was emphatically a man of the people, and the people loved him. Most touching were the demonstrations of affection and regret as we laid him to rest beneath the shadows of his own loved mountains, his bier surrounded by weeping multitudes of lifelong friends and neighbors. A beloved wife and six devoted children survive him, but they mourn not as those who have no hope, for in life, "before the evil days came nigh," he made his peace with God and died in that peace which passeth all understanding.

Let us be warned of the uncertainty of life by his untimely taking off.

Art is long, and time is fleeting,
And our hearts, though stout and brave,
Still like muffled drums are beating
Funeral marches to the grave.

Decay and dissolution are irrevocably written by the iron pen of destiny across the page of life. Life and death are interwoven in our being in the very hour of birth, and in all life we bear the seeds and certainty of death. The conflict between these forces is irrepressible, the end inevitable.

"It is appointed unto all men once to die." "One event happeneth to all; as dies the fool so dies the wise man."

Fortunate is our endowment, that we can not fully realize these great truths in personal application, else life would be but living death.

And yet to each of us the dread summons must come, as it has come to all who have lived before us.

The fathers, where are they?

To each of us, if spared from "battle, murder, and sudden death," there will some time come a sickness unto death. There will be a last gathering of friends and loved ones around the bedside, a few faintly spoken adieus, a stilling of the life pulse, and the dark wing of the death angel will brush out our mortal vision forever. There will be the hush of whispered voices, and the soft tread of slippered feet in the silent chamber of death, a little cortège to the tomb, and the clods of the valley will cover us.

And is this all? Endeth thus the dream of life in the darkness and death damp of the grave?

Shall the funeral pall enshroud us forever? Has He who planted reproductive life in the insensate and inanimate failed or forgotten it in His highest creature, man? Is man of less account than seed, and fruit and flower, and egg and nut, that he should die forever, while they perpetuate life perennially?

Nay, verily the lesson of all life is that man is immortal and his life eternal.

The grave but vainly entombs the chrysalis of immortality.

"If a man die, shall he live again?" Yea and amen; by every analogy of life, by every law of nature, by every principle of evolution, by every deduction of biology, by every yearning of the soul, by every revelation of God he shall live again, and live forever. Annihilation is the exceptional nightmare of wailing despair; immortality the universal intuition of hoping humanity.

And what of that life in the great beyond? We build for it here day by day, and as certainly as the builder determines the character of his structure by the material used, so certainly do we determine our status in the great hereafter by the life we now live in the flesh. "Be not deceived; whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."

It is a consolation to believe that our departed friend builded well; that he found the more than philosopher's stone—the pearl of great price—and that it is well with his soul.

The admonition of this solemn hour is, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh."

Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to append to these remarks some extracts from the funeral address by Rev. J. E. Abernethy, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Waynesville, N. C., who was Mr. MOODY'S pastor. I also ask unanimous consent that members who so desire may have leave to print.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order has already been made.

The extracts from the funeral address of Rev. J. E. Abernethy are as follows:

Like the majority of great men, Mr. MOODY spent the first part of his life in the midst of stubborn difficulties. While he was only a poor boy, laboring on the farm, ardent desires to become useful and distinguished, hopes and dreams of future greatness, those voiceless longings for immortality, filled his veins with fire. The restless emulation that at first thrilled his ambitious heart at the mention of great names, the wild hopes which flushed the cheek and made the pulse beat quick as he pondered upon the future, never left him. His heart was of heroic mold. As he struggled up the steep and thorny way of life, his mighty courage laughed at the obstacles that crowded about him. Difficulties that have daunted and dismayed other men were but stepping stones to him. He had that assurance which is ever the companion of genius and that royal faith whose eagle eye pierced through the darkest night and saw the day beyond. Like the boy of Sparta, when his sword was too short he added a step to it. Finally he was crowned with success.

For twenty years he has been a leader in almost every public interest of this county. His optimistic spirit, his commanding presence, his wealth of common sense, always placed him in the forefront of the great movements of his people. He had the divine art of doing great things with ease.

As a representative of the bar he was one of the most successful of the State. He was especially prominent as a criminal lawyer. His public sevrice gave general satisfaction to all classes of people, regardless of faith or party. As State senator, as Congressman, no man ever labored more enthusiastically for the good of his county. He seemed to have every man's interest at heart, and he labored hard that he might do the best for each and all. He was devoted to his work, and no social occasion ever persuaded him away from duty.

But it is not necessary to speak at length of his public services. Their character is the best attestation of their worth and sincerity. They glow upon his country's history. They burn in shimmering glory upon his country's banner. They are written upon hearts of multitudes with a stylus of fire.

As a man he was a center of attraction, a favorite among all classes of people. To know him was to love him. His great heart and personal magnetism, his manly sympathy and noble affability, charmed thousands into his friendship. On this ground many men of the opposite political faith forgot their own party and voted for him.

It has been said that he was as familiar with the Congressmen, the President, and his Cabinet, as he was with the men of his own town, and at the same time the poorest boy—the most friendless man in all these mountains—found in him a friend in the truest sense. He was preeminently a friend to the poor and needy. When he could help his friends, he did it promptly and with great pleasure. When he was unable to do a friend a favor, he did not rest until he found some one who could. He was often in debt, but it was due to the fact that he borrowed money to lighten some man's burden.

Like all other men he had his faults, but he was so generous, so charitable, so warm hearted, so great that many people never recognized anything in his life but the virtues that made him prominent. He was a man of marked character, of pronounced qualities, of Roman dignity and deserved distinction. There was an inflexible integrity in his public conduct, an indescribable fascination in his familiar conversation, a condensed energy in his discourse, a quickness of perception, a vigor of deduction, a directness and devotedness of purpose in all he did as a representative of the people.

Major MOODY'S life was an incarnation of the proverb of Sallust, "Every man is the architect of his own fortune."

Many a poor and helpless boy will see in his life an illustration of the mighty fact that the way to greatness is open to all, and from that illustration many will receive an inspiration to rise from their poverty, ignorance, and lethargy and take the way that leads to prosperity and renown. Great men by the study of his life will become greater. Representatives from our Government will receive from his example a new accession to their love of patriotism and their passion for national prosperity.

The news of his death waked the keenest grief in the hearts of thousands. Countless homes have been darkened by the shadow of this death angel's wing. Language has no power to express the overshadowing, overpowering sense of our country's common loss.

When his spirit left us we could but exclaim—

"Another beacon light blown out above us, Another buoy bell stilled upon the sea."

We all but feel as if a corpse were lying in our own homes.

Now that he has been taken from our midst, he who has been a guide and a leader in this generation, he who has been so strong to stand and so bold to go forward, he who has been such a fortress and tower to so many—now that he is gone forever, may God's richest blessings rest upon all who are bereaved.

Heavenly Father, send Thy grace and consolation to this mourning people. Bless the wife—Thou who hast put in the Holy Bible so many words for the widow, bless and comfort and guide her through life.

Let Thy richest grace comfort these children. Lead each one of them into the very best and most useful life. Grant unto them to feel the immense responsibility of inheriting the fame of their father. God Almighty, bless every friend and loved one who has been made sad by this death.

Help us all, Thou great God of our salvation, help us all to consecrate our lives to Jesus Christ. May we all be a blessing to our country and make our generation better for having lived.

Finally give us a home in Thy glorious and eternal Kingdom, and the praise shall be thine forever.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, others have spoken of the life work of our deceased friend. Others have told of the struggle of his early manhood; how he overcame every obstacle and rose to prominence; of his success at the bar and in the political arena. It is merely my purpose to place a little bunch of acacias on his grave in token of my friendship for my dead colleague.

While his name still lingers upon the records of this Congress, while we still see his familiar face, it is well we should pause to speak of his good qualities, that those who come after us may know that when JAMES M. MOODY died his State lost a devoted son and his country a patriotic Representative in Congress.

How soon the greatest are almost entirely forgotten! For a moment we may think the services of the most eminent member of this body are indispensable to his country, and yet, when Providence shall call him hence, his place will be immediately filled and the machinery of Government never for an instant will stop. It were well if we could all keep in mind that life is but death's prelude, simply execution's stay.

I desire to record this estimate of our deceased friend. He was kind hearted and generous. He despised not one of God's creatures. He could not cherish malice. He was tender in his home. It was not characteristic of him to speak evil of any man. He ardently loved his State. He was an American, willing to risk his life for his country. He was honest in his convictions. As a lawyer he was faithful to his clients, as solicitor in the courts he was faithful to his State, as a Representative in Congress he was faithful to the interest of the Republic as God gave him light to see.

And he believed in God. In the thunder he heard His voice; in the sunshine he saw His smile, and in the growing crops he perceived His all-pervading goodness and mercy.

As the spirit of this generous, patriotic man was passing out, as the beautiful mountains around his home were fading in life's twilight, as the merry laughter of rippling Richland was dying in his ears, let us hope it was mercifully granted to him to see the white spires of the Celestial City and hear the music of the eternal morn.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, it was said by Mark Antony in the Roman forum, with the dead body of the greatest of all Romans before him—

I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him.

We, Mr. Speaker, come here to-day not to bury our late colleague and associate, JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, but to praise him. He was a man who deserved praise. Born and reared in the mountains of North Carolina, he was emphatically a mountain man, possessing all of the characteristics of the best specimens of typical mountaineers.. I know these mountaineers, Mr. Speaker. I have lived among them. Whenever I strike a mountaineer, I have a certain measure of respect for him, for he has come from the hands of God, without the additions which art or fashion puts upon the most of men. He is emphatically a God-made man. The mountain men, not only of North Carolina, but of every section of our country, and especially the mountain men from the regions east of the Mississippi, have been noted during the whole of our history for the possession of many of the grandest characteristics that adorn eminence in manhood, citizenship, and patriotism.

The mountain men of North Carolina, like those of Tennessee, are Nature's own children. You need not go among them to find leaders of fashion or gay followers of frivolity. They do not belong to the class who—

Caper nimbly in a lady's chamber
To the lascivious pleasing of a lute.

But as friends none are more true, as citizens none are more patriotic, as Christians none are more devout.

When the shadow of war darkens over the land, when the drum beats and the bugle blows, when the flag is run up in the sky, and the President calls on the brave and the patriotic to rally to the defense of our country, nowhere between the Atlantic and the Pacific, nowhere between the Lakes and the Gulf, do you find more men to rally or men to rally more quickly under the banner of their country than the stalwart sons of these mountains, and none braver or stronger.

In the dark days of the American Revolution, when the cause of old England seemed in the ascendency, when the hearts of Washington and his compeers had begun to weaken, and the bright-winged dove of hope seemed about to fly away and the black-winged vulture of despair to take its place, when Georgia had been subjugated and Cornwallis had overrun South Carolina and North Carolina and was moving toward Virginia, and all the cities upon the Northern coast were in the possession of British soldiers or sailors, then it was that the men of the mountains in which JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY was born and raised, under the leadership of John Sevier, afterwards the first governor of Tennessee, and Isaac Shelby, afterwards the first governor of Kentucky, and their immortal compatriots, without any orders from the General Government, without any of them wearing a uniform, without any of them armed with a weapon except those purchased with their own money, and mounted on their own horses, descending from those mountains of North Carolina like an avalanche of valor and patriotism, on that fateful day in October, 1780, fell upon the British troops under Ferguson, at Kings Mountain, and delivered a blow whose echoes were heard throughout the length and breadth of the infant Republic, encouraging the hearts of patriots everywhere, and whose reverberations crossed the Atlantic Ocean and warned King George that the tide of battle had at last turned against him in this New World.

When, in the next war with England, after our armies had been defeated in almost every battle on American soil, after Hull had surrendered at Detroit, after this city had been captured, the Capitol burned, the defenses of Baltimore bombarded, our seacoasts ravaged by English soldiers and English ships, when, in January, 1815, the victorious hosts of England were about to capture New Orleans, and in capturing New Orleans capture Louisiana and the Mississippi River and all that great Western country out of which so many grand States have since been carved, then it was that the mountain men of North Carolina, Tennessee, and Kentucky confronted the British forces on the plain of Chalmette, confronted the veteran soldiers who had defeated the armies of Napoleon in old Europe—then it was that these mountain riflemen, with Andrew Jackson at their head, hurled back the armies of Pakenham and Gibbs, and won that victory which has made the name of Jackson and the battle of New Orleans immortal in the history of our country and in the annals of the world.

Mr. MOODY himself had no opportunity to distinguish himself in war, but when the conflict with Spain arose he at once offered his services to his country, and became an officer in our Army. He did all any brave man and patriot could do to show his devotion to his country; and if the necessities of the war had called him to the field of battle, he no doubt would have proved himself a worthy son of our mountain land.

Mr. MOODY lived at Waynesville, in "the land of the sky," a beautiful little mountain city 2,600 feet above the level of the sea, and surrounded by mountains 6,000 feet above the level of the sea—more than a mile high. Look which way you will from Mr. MOODY'S home and a most magnificent panorama of mountains stands before you, some of the peaks towering sublimely far into the heavens. Notably among these peaks is Junaleska, glorious in its majesty and sublime in its proportions. While we were attending the funeral the clouds and mists enveloped all of the valleys and lower mountains. The great breast of Junaleska was enveloped as in a mighty garment, but through the rifts of the mists could be seen the sunlight on its summit glittering like a crown of glory in the upper sky, recalling vividly the familiar lines—

As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm;
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

Such were the surroundings of Mr. MOODY'S home. None could be lovelier, none more inspiring; and as were the mountains, so was he—massive in his person, a huge body, a great head, stalwart arms, legs of oak, and a heart big, brave, and bountiful. No better specimen of our mountain men ever sat on this floor. Some may have thought him rather rough in his exterior, but, Mr. Speaker—

Within the oyster's shell uncouth
The purest pearl may bide;
Trust me, you'll find a heart of truth
Within that rough outside.

Such was JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY. As a mountain man I had a fellow feeling for him, as a patriot I honored him, as a friend I loved him. In the very prime of life, but a few days ago in the very glory of healthful manhood, apparently armed against disease from head to foot, with apparently thirty years of active, useful, honorable life ahead of him, and behold, all on a sudden, we saw the flag above this Hall at half-mast. Many of us, knowing nothing of his sickness, and, if knowing anything, not in the least suspecting a fatal issue, inquired "Who is dead?" The answer came, "JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY."

He was dead, and his death warns us that death is no respecter of persons. that the stoutest, the bravest, the boldest, the youngest are as apt to be reached by the fatal shaft of the impartial archer as is the old man, tottering on his last legs, feebly walking, bent and bowed, with the aid of a cane.

Let us draw a lesson from this, Mr. Speaker, to so conduct our lives that when the end comes to us—as come it must, and come it will, and how soon we know not, for no man knoweth whose name is written upon the arrow which the archer, Death, will next draw from his quiver—let us so live that when the end comes to us we may fold our arms in hopeful resignation, trusting that when we close our eyes for the last time we close them to this world of trouble and of sorrow only to open them in that other world of peace and joy, in that other "land of the sky," where they will never be closed again, and that there, ready to greet us, in that blessed country of immortality we will behold, transfigured and all glorious, the person of our friend and colleague, JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, When a few weeks ago the wires flashed to his colleagues in Congress the sad news of the sudden death of JAMES M. MOODY the first impression, mingled with regret, made upon my mind was that the pitiless destroyer of mankind had stricken down in the prime of life one who was apparently the most robust of all the members of the North Carolina delegation. Possessing a powerful physical frame and a strong constitution, it seemed to those who knew him well that many years of active life were before him. But men, as well as States and nations, must bow to the divine decree, and while we are divinely told that the allotted period of man's life is three score and ten years, it is the universal human experience that death has no time and no season.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set; but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

Horace, the Latin poet, voices another experience of humanity when he says:

"Pallida mors æquo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas regumque turres"—Pale death with impartial foot knocks at the cottages of the poor and the palaces of kings. "Vitæ summa brevis spem nos vetat inchoare longam"—The short span of life forbids us to form remote expectations.

JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, Republican, of Waynesville, was born on a farm in Cherokee (now Graham) County, N. C., February 12, 1858. While an infant his parents moved to Haywood County, where he lived and died. As a boy he worked on the farm during the summer months and attended the neighborhood schools in the winter. At the age of 17 he entered Waynesville Academy, remaining two years, and then attended Candler College, in Buncombe County, N. C., for one year; studied law under a private instructor at Waynesville, and was admitted to the bar in January, 1881. In 1886 was elected prosecuting attorney of the twelfth judicial district of North Carolina, and served in that capacity for four years. In 1894 was elected to the State senate for two years. He served through the Spanish-American war as major and chief commissary of United States Volunteers on the staff of Maj. Gen. J. Warren Keifer, who commanded the First Division of the Seventh Army Corps. He was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress, receiving 19,334 votes, to 17,250 for W. T. Crawford, Democrat.

This brief biographical sketch from the Congressional Directory discloses the sterling qualities of this man, to whom to-day we pay a last and an accustomed, but heart-felt and sincere, tribute of respect. Lawyer, State senator, solicitor or prosecuting attorney, major in the Spanish-American war, and Congressman—in the brief period of forty-five years few men have achieved such varied distinction. Every position which he won was by dint of hard and earnest work, and was the result of physical and mental toil and effort. His success in life was achieved in his own home, among the mountains of North Carolina, which he loved so well. If nothing was to stay the cold hand of death, it was meet and appropriate that he should die within sight of those grand peaks of the Blue Ridge, piercing the clouds and skies of the "Switzerland of America"—western North Carolina—which have given inspiration and cheer and courage to so many of the most distinguished of North Carolina's many distinguished sons; men like Vance, Merrimon, Clingman, and many others who have been loved and honored by North Carolinians.

Just a week before the departure of Mr. MOODY for his home in Waynesville, when he was feeling depressed and ill, and with evidently some premonition of his approaching end, he said to a newspaper correspondent, "If I am going to die, I want to die where I have lived, among the mountains, God's country." To him it was indeed God's country, and the pure, clear air of the mountains was to him the very breath of life.

In all of us dwells the abiding sense of our local attachments, and we long in our last moments to look upon those scenes connected with the earliest and the most beloved memories and associations of our lives. When one of the Presidents of this great Republic, James A. Garfield, was stricken down by the assassin's bullet, Mr. Blaine tells us in his magnificent oration that his early craving for the sea returned and he was borne, accompanied by the hopes and prayers of the nation, to the "longed-for healing of the sea, there to live or die, as God should will, within sight of its heaving billows, within sound of its manifold voices."

And so JAMES M. MOODY craved once again for the healing of the mountains, the balsamic odors, the rugged and lofty peaks, the clear, blue sky, and the marvelous changing and shifting clouds and scenes of the "Land of the Sky."

His life was spent among the people of this land from his early boyhood, and they loved, trusted, and honored him. He was faithful and true to them and failed not to respond to every call and demand of his State or country in peace or in war. Honest, laborious, rugged in character and physique as his native and beloved mountains, let us hope that in his last moments he drew inspiration, comfort, courage, and peace from them, and was enabled to look up and beyond the mists and shadows which surround their lofty peaks and with the eye of faith to catch some glimpses of the eternal world and feel from the mountain tops the breath of the eternal morning.

Mr. Speaker, this sudden death of our colleague, following so many other deaths in this Congress, and, in my brief service of two terms in Congress, following the death of many eminent public men, including both a President and Vice-President of the Republic, emphasizes that our human life hangs by a thread; the sword of Damocles, as we sit at the feast, is suspended over us.

"All men think all other men mortal but themselves;" and the idea of following in the footsteps of our departed colleagues in and through the dark Valley of the Shadow is far from the thoughts of any of us; yet we know neither the day nor the hour decreed for our departure. Whether it be near or far, however, the discharge of our duty to the district and the State we represent and to our country is the greatest of all earthly consolations when that inevitable hour comes.

We are told by the historian:

"Over a hundred years ago, on May 19, 1780, in New England there was a day of remarkable gloom and darkness, still known as 'the dark day,' a day in which the light of the sun was extinguished as if by an eclipse. The legislature of Connecticut was in session; and as its members saw the unexpected darkness coming on, they shared in the general awe and terror. It was supposed by many that the last day, the Day of Judgment, had come. Some one, in the consternation of the hour, moved an adjournment. Then there arose an old Puritan legislator, Davenport, of Stamford, and said that if the last day had come, he desired to be found at his place doing his duty, and therefore moved that candles be brought in, so that the house could proceed with the legislative business."

And so, as has been well said by that great captain and leader of the Southern armies, Robert E. Lee, duty is the sublimest word in the English language; and however near the final summons may be to any one of us, the example of this old Puritan is worthy of imitation and commendation. And the discharge of our duty will be to us the most comforting thought in our last hour on earth.

So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, the great Being has decreed that death must come to all. When youth, with its rosy coloring and bright anticipations, ripens into maturity, it is the most conspicuous event which the future casts athwart the horizon. As the members of one's family and one's friends and acquaintances take their departure into the mysterious future we are constantly reminded that we, too, may be the next to cross the dark river. It is well, perhaps, that these reflections should bid us pause from time to time in the busy march of life and ask when each of us may fall from the ranks and join the innumerable company which have gone before.

Familiarity with death and the consciousness of our lot does not, however, detract from the solemnity of each occasion when we are called upon to mourn the loss of one with whom we have been associated in life. Whether we look upon it with shuddering horror, or whether faith has clothed the life to come with brightness and happiness, or whether the suffering and unhappiness of this world look with welcome upon the transition, it is still all mysterious and unfathomable by the exercise of any of the faculties with which we are endowed. Let those who have faith in immortality and in a brighter and better life nurture their faith and their anticipations, because they are thereby made happier in this world and have assurances of that which is to come.

It was not my good fortune to know intimately Mr. MOODY. While we both lived in the same State, yet we were separated several hundred miles. His home was in the mountains, under the shadow, almost, of Mount Mitchell, while my home was far even beyond the foothills, in the level tide-water plateau, near old ocean.

I dislike a fulsome eulogy to the dead. There exists in every man, particularly those who have followed the bent of ambition and achieved distinction, characteristics and impulses which single him out apart from his fellows. There are none of us without faults.

I was one of the members of this House who accompanied the committee on its sad mission to Waynesville to participate in the last honors to all that was mortal of our late friend and colleague. On the day when we laid his body away in the beautiful cemetery the elements contributed to add their share of gloom to the occasion. In his home town, nestling in a beautiful valley and surrounded by beautiful mountains, which seem to wall it in from the outer world, the mist and the rain shrouded the mountain tops and swept over into the beautiful valley. However, this did not deter the friends and acquaintances of the dead from gathering once more to gaze upon their comrade and honored citizen and to follow the cortège to his last resting place. Not only from the town, but from the surrounding country, they came, on horseback and in vehicles, along heavy mountain roads and through the pelting rain. I talked with some of them about the dead man, and there were two characteristics upon which all were in harmony and upon which they loved to dwell. One was his kindly, impulsive, generous heart, particularly toward the helpless and the weak, and the other was his love of those whom we call the people.

I have an intense admiration for a man of kindly, humane impulses and sympathetic heart; the man who carries with him sunshine, who can weep with those who are in sorrow and laugh with those who are in gladness; who speaks a kind and cheerful word to those who are despondent and unhappy and who extends the glad hand of encouragement to those who are faint hearted; for the man who is willing to divide with the poor and who is ever ready to listen to the appeals of the less fortunate. The greatest of all virtues is charity—charity of purpose, charity of opinion, the charity which overlooks frailties and the faults of others. It was said that very few appealed to him in vain, and that there were men and women among those sturdy mountaineers who had been lifted up and encouraged and induced to turn their faces again to the light under the inspiration of his kindly nature.

Mr. MOODY had been reared among the people of the mountains. He had been in their homes; he was familiar with their habits, their trials, their hopes and aspirations. They had known him in youth and they had watched with pride his steady progress to manhood. Promotion and advancement did not cause him to forget his old friends and acquaintances. While ambitious he was not proud. As he entered the world, far removed from his old environments, surrounded by new faces and friends, his heart ever turned toward the mountains, and he was always glad of the opportunity to mingle again with his people and to stand upon his native heath. When he left this beautiful city and gazed for the last time upon its stately Capitol, he realized that he might not return again, and expressed the wish, if he must die, that he be permitted to take a last farewell in sight of his mountains and surrounded by his own people.

Charity and love of the people! These two traits alone are enough to distinguish him and to preserve his memory. The good minister who officiated in the solemn funeral services in the church referred to the beautiful floral offerings which were piled in profusion around the bier and expressed the hope that the memory of Mr. MOODY might continue longer than the fragrance and life of those beautiful flowers. That hope will be realized. Not so much by the stately granite of the mountains which shall be reared over his grave, but in the memory of the good men and women who knew his virtues in life and who will preserve them for all time to come as a sweet and precious heritage.

And then (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), in pursuance of the resolutions, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased members, the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 23, 1903.

Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we praise Thee that this great Government of ours was founded upon the sure and safe principles of religion. To seek and worship Thee in freedom of conscience and thought was the avowed purpose of that noble band of heroes who first sought these shores to establish an empire of liberty. In the early days amidst strife and hardship the nation learned to pray.

We bless Thee that Thou didst commit the great work first of establishing our independence, then of shaping and molding our national character into the hands of one who not only in ideals, but in personal character embodied the elements of truth and greatness which have been inwrought into our national history.

We praise Thee for the faith of our fathers. We pray that we may be saved from the shame of forgetfulness of the God of our fathers. Grant us the same ideals of liberty, the same exalted patriotism, the same unselfish motives, that in the severer tests and tasks which have come to us we may be enabled to successfully establish upon a yet wider and firmer basis this great empire that stands for the brotherhood of man and the glory of Thy name.

In the days of our prosperity and glory may we keep bright the memory of those, who, through Thy protection and guidance, secured to us our great blessings of civil and religious liberty, and may we continue their work in yet more firmly establishing the rights and liberties of all the people.

We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last; when, on request of Mr. TELLER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Washington's Farewell Address will now be read by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

Mr. DUBOIS (at the Vice-President's desk) read the address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety, and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is intended to terminate the career of my political life my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me, and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead; amidst appearances sometimes dubious; vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging; in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guaranty of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present to offer to your solemn contemplation and to recommend to your frequent review some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all-important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget as an encouragement to it your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvements of interior communications by land and water will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort, and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionately greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations, and what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same governments, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western—whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of a party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our Western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head. They have seen in the negotiation by the Executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties—that with Great Britain and that with Spain—which secure to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your union a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute. They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay by the adoption of a constitution of government better calculated than your former for an intimate union and for the efficacious management of your common concerts. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction; to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of a party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community, and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common counsels and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government, destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which may impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

The spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissention, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful depotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourge and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursement to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives; but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct. And can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation prompted by ill will and resentment sometimes impels to war the government contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject. At other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference for public opinion or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils? Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not legally hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish—that they will control the usual current of the passions or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good—that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism—this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound in duty and interest to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my Administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am, nevertheless, too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence, and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow-citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever-favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GO: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, September 19, 1796.

IMPROVEMENTS AT BROOKLYN NAVY-YARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 16th instant, certain information relative to what improvements are necessary in the water front of the navy-yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., for the proper berthing of battle ships and fleets; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the fact that he laid before the Senate prior to the Senator's coming into the Chamber a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in response to a Senate resolution touching appropriations necessary for improvements at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, New York, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed. The Chair desires to know whether the Senator wishes the papers to be printed?

Mr. HALE. How numerous are the papers?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers are rather voluminous, but the Chair thinks they might easily be printed in a day.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs will have the bill up for consideration in the course of one or two days, and I think the papers had better be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the order heretofore made will stand.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting estimates of appropriations required for the Department of Commerce and Labor for the service for the remainder of the current fiscal year and of the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REMY BAGARRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings filed by the court in the cause of Remy Bagarry v. The United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIG PATRIOT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel brig Patriot, Richard Bishop, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SENATOR FROM UTAH.

Mr. KEARNS presented the credentials of Reed Smoot, chosen by the legislature of Utah a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1903; which were read and ordered to be placed on file.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, there has come to me, as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, a protest in the matter of Reed Smoot, Senator-elect from the State of Utah. I present it to the Senate and ask that it may be placed on file.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received and placed on file.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 6515) to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C.;

A bill (S. 6525) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia;" and

A bill (S. 7223) providing for the interment of the remains of Marie Irene Donaldson and her daughter, Marie Irene Donaldson.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14050) to amend an act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia.

The message further communicated to the Senate resolutions passed by the House commemorative of the life and services of Hon. THOMAS H. TONGUE, late a Representative from the State of Oregon.

The message also communicated to the Senate resolutions passed by the House commemorative of the life and services of Hon. JOHN N. W. RUMPLE, late a Representative from the State of Iowa.

The message further communicated to the Senate resolutions passed by the House commemorative of the life and services of Hon. JAMES MONTRAVILLE MOODY, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 7363) to permit the Secretary of State to cause the destruction of invoices of merchandise exported to the United States which have been on file in the consular offices for more than five years;

A bill (H. R. 16021) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 148) to provide for the printing of a digest of the laws, decisions, and opinions relating to pardons and other acts of executive clemency under the United States and the several States.

VISITORS TO ANNAPOLIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MCCOMAS and Mr. DANIEL members of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to attend the next annual examination of cadets at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., required by the act of February 14, 1879.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ALGER and Mr. BACON members of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to attend the next annual examination of cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., under the requirements of section 1327 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PLATT of Connecticut a regent of the Smithsonian Institution to succeed himself, his term expiring the 3d day of March next.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegram, in the nature of a petition, from the legislature of the State of Washington, praying that the clause relating to the granting of a bonus of 4 per cent to Pacific coast naval contracts be reinserted in the naval appropriation bill. The Chair suggests that the telegram be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

OLYMPIA, WASH., February 21, 1903.

To the President of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

Your memorialists, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Washington, hereby respectfully represent that it is to the interest of the United States to have large shipyards upon the Pacific coast.

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States is reported to have stricken from the general appropriation bill the bonus of 4 per cent heretofore granted to Pacific-coast naval contracts, making it impossible for Pacific-coast shipbuilders to take future contracts; therefore your memorialists do pray that your honorable body take such steps as are necessary to have the 4 per cent bonus proviso reinstated in such appropriation bill, and your memorialists will ever pray.

Dated at Olympia, Wash., this 17th day of February, 1903.

W. H. HARE, Speaker of the House.
J. J. SMITH, President of the Senate.

Witness my hand this 21st day of February, 1903.

STOREY BUCK, Clerk of the House.

Mr. DUBOIS. I present a petition of the legislature of the State of Idaho, praying that an appropriation be made for defining the boundary lines between the States of Montana and Idaho. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TELLER. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I think it has been the practice of the Senate that all petitions and memorials from State legislatures should be read in full to the Senate. I do not like to see that rule abolished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice during the incumbency of the present Presiding Officer of the Senate has been in a large majority of cases to print such memorials in the RECORD without reading; but, of course, if any Senator desires to have the memorial read to the Senate, that will be done.

Mr. TELLER. I should make that request if it was earlier in the session, but it is so late now that I shall not do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the memorial will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

STATE OF IDAHO, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Will H. Gibson, secretary of the State of Idaho, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of house joint memorial No. 1, by committee on State affairs, which was filed in this office the 17th day of February, A. D. 1903, and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Boise City, the capital of Idaho, this 17th day of February, A. D. 1903.

[SEAL.]

WILL H. GIBSON,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint memorial No. 1, by committee on State affairs. Memorial to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled.

We, your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that

Whereas the boundary line between the States of Montana and Idaho is not well defined; and

Whereas the opening up and development of the region adjacent makes the accurate location of the boundary line urgent;

We therefore respectfully ask that an appropriation sufficient to meet the imperative need be granted for the purpose herein set forth, and your memorialists will ever pray.

This senate joint memorial was adopted by the senate on the 12th day of February, 1903.

JAMES M. STEVENS,
President of the Senate.

This senate joint memorial was adopted by the house of representatives on the 11th day of February, 1903.

JAMES F. HUNT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

State of Idaho, received and filed February 17, 1903.

WILL H. GIBSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CULLOM presented memorials of Coopers' Local Union No. 94, of Chicago; of Coopers' Local Union No. 142, of Aurora, and of Coopers' Local Union No. 104, of Murphysboro, all of the American Federation of Labor, in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the repeal of the revenue stamp tax on eighths kegs of beer; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Local Division, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation granting to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to reduce the amount of air to be used on trains; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of Local Union No. 81, of Rock Island; of Local Union No. 547, of Freeport; of Local Union No. 121, of East St. Louis; of Local Union No. 353, of Belleville; of Local Union No. 85, of Kensington, and of Local Union No. 176, of Bloomington, all of the American Federation of Labor; of Local Division No. 228, Amalgamated Association of Street Railway Employees, of Joliet, and of Local Division No. 266, Calumet Electric Street Railway Employees, of Chicago, all in the State of Illinois, praying for the passage of the so-called eight-hour bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of Grommes & Ullrich, of Chicago; of Colburn Birks & Co., and sundry other business firms of Peoria; of Corning & Co. of Peoria; and of the Rudolph Stecher Brewing Company, of Murphysboro, all in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation granting to the States power to deal with intoxicating liquors which may be shipped into their territory from other States; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hoopeston, Ava, Prophetstown, Carthage, Bloomington, Illiopolis, Dixon, Evanston, Fisher, Shirland, Joliet, and Genesee, all in the State of Illinois, and of sundry citizens of Biloxi, Miss., praying for the enactment of legislation granting to the States power to deal with intoxicating liquors which may be shipped into their territory from other States; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MASON. I present the petition of the general secretary-treasurer of the Order of Knights of Labor, of Washington, D. C., relative to the abolishment of capital punishment and the substitution of punishment by life imprisonment. The petition is short and treats of a very important matter, I think. I ask that it be read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I desire to call the attention of that committee to the petition and accompanying papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks for the reading of a petition presented by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

A PETITION.

OFFICE OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
ORDER OF KNIGHTS OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., February 23, 1903.

To the Senate of the United States:

Your undersigned petitioner, the general secretary-treasurer of the Order of the Knights of Labor, most respectfully asks your honorable body to adopt the proposed joint resolution abolishing capital punishment and substituting punishment by life imprisonment in its stead.

Very respectfully,

I. D. CHAMBERLAIN,
General Secretary-Treasurer, Knights of Labor.

Mr. MASON. I present a petition of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Chicago, Ill., relative to the action by the English Government in sentencing Col. Arthur Lynch to penal servitude for life. I ask that the petition may be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., February 19, 1903.

Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: At a joint meeting of Division 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians, and Division 18, Ladies' Auxiliary Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Cook County, Ill., the undersigned committee presented the following resolutions, which were duly ratified, and I was instructed to forward a copy to you, honorable sir, with the request that the subject contained therein would receive your kind consideration:

Whereas the English Government has condemned Col. Arthur Lynch to penal servitude for life for the part he played in the Boer war; and

Whereas it was under pretext of the Boer Republic not allowing English subjects to become citizens of the Transvaal that war on the Republic was declared by England; and

Whereas Colonel Lynch, in the eyes of all liberty-loving citizens, has committed no offense against English law in taking up arms in defense of his adopted country; and

Whereas the English Government has never been at a loss for a reason to hang or imprison her Irish subjects or men of Irish blood, no matter to what country they may owe allegiance.

Resolved, That Division 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians, in conjunction with Division 18, Ladies' Auxiliary Ancient Order of Hibernians, condemns the action of the English Government in sentencing Col. Arthur Lynch to penal servitude for life for defending by arms the rights of his adopted country, and we see in his imprisonment another crimson mark on the escutcheon of a bloody, brutal, and tyrannical Government, ever ready to hang or prosecute one of our kith and kin.

Resolved, That we demand the release of Colonel Lynch as a right due any citizen of the Transvaal Republic who bore arms during the war; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senator WILLIAM E. MASON, with the request that he use his good offices for the speedy release of Colonel Lynch

MATTHEW GORMANLY,
PETER DOODY,
M. A. MAHONEY,
On behalf of Division 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians.
MARGARET MURPHY,
MARY A. GORMANLY,
On behalf of Division 18, Ladies' Auxiliary Ancient Order of Hibernians.

Respectfully submitted by, honorable sir, your obedient servant,

PETER DOODY,
Recording Secretary Division 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians.

176 WEST TWENTY-THIRD STREET, CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. DOLLIVER presented a petition of Elkhorn Lodge, No. 171, International Association of Machinists, of Missouri Valley, Iowa, praying for the passage of the so-called eight-hour bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Lamoile; of the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, and Church of Christ churches, of Murray, and of sundry citizens of Davenport, all in the State of Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation granting to the States power to deal with intoxicating liquors which may be shipped into their territory from other States; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BATE presented a petition of Grand Council of Tennessee, Royal Arcanum, of Nashville, Tenn., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Post-Office appropriation bill providing that all periodical publications, entered as second-class mail matter, when deposited for local delivery by letter carriers shall be subject only to the pound rate of postage, to be prepaid as that rate is now prepaid; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of the Western Retail Implement and Vehicle Dealers' Association, of Kansas City, Mo.; praying for the ratification of the pending reciprocity treaties, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Newspaper Mailers' Union, No. 3, of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the repeal of the so-called desert-land law and the commutation clause of the homestead act; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FRYE presented resolutions of the legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts relative to the enactment of legislation providing pensions in the Life-Saving Service; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the year 1903. Resolutions in support of a bill pending in the Congress of the United States providing for pensions in the Life-Saving Service.

Whereas there is pending in Congress a bill granting pensions to certain officers and enlisted men in the Life-Saving Service, and to their widows and minor children; and

Whereas this bill was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last report, and by a majority of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the general court favors the above-mentioned bill, and requests the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts to vote for the measure.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each member of Congress from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 5, 1903.

Adopted: Sent up for concurrence.

JAMES W. KIMBALL, Clerk.
SENATE, February 10, 1903.

Adopted in concurrence.

HENRY D. COOLIDGE, Clerk.

A true copy. Attest:
JAMES W. KIMBALL,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul, Minn., praying for the ratification of the Hay-Bond Newfoundland reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the memorial of James Hill, of Jackson, Miss., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation granting to the State of Mississippi more land for school purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of James Selden Cowdon, of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to abolish capital punishment; which was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

He also presented a memorial of the National Christian League for the Promotion of Social Purity, of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the seating of Hon. Reed Smoot, of Utah, as a United States Senator; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

SIOUX INDIANS OF NEBRASKA AND SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GAMBLE. I present a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, and also one from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in connection with a hearing had before the subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate on the bill (S. 594) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863. I move that the communications be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6207) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sheridan, in the State of Wyoming, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

TERMS OF COURT IN EIGHTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. PETTUS. For the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] I report favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (S. 7412) to amend the second section of an act entitled "An act providing that the circuit court of appeals of the eighth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado, or in the city of Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, on the first Monday in September in each year, and at the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, on the first Monday in May in each year," approved June 9, 1902.

The bill was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second section of the act entitled "An act providing that the circuit court of appeals of the eighth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado, or in the city of Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, on the first Monday in September in each year, and at the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, on the first Monday in May in each year," approved June 9, 1902, be amended by inserting, after the word "Wyoming," at the end of section 2, the following:

"And except also that the right of appeal from an interlocutory order or decree under the provisions of section 7 of chapter 517, 26 United States Statutes at Large, amended by chapter 803, 31 United States Statutes at Large, shall not be affected by this act, and appeals taken from such interlocutory orders or decrees may be heard and disposed of by the United States circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit at any term thereof."

Mr. TELLER. The bill which has just been reported is a bill of some importance to the legal profession in the eighth circuit, as it provides for holding terms of court in that circuit, and has no other purpose. The bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up at this time for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill just reported by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] may receive present consideration. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS-MARTIAL IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on the Philippines, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] on the 27th of January last, to report it with amendments. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Philippines, reports, with amendments, the resolution referred to by him and asks that it may be considered at this time. It will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. RAWLINS January 27, 1903, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inform the Senate what courts-martial have been ordered and held in the Philippine Islands, and what judgments rendered by them in consequence of the dispatch sent by the Secretary of War to Major-General Chaffee referred to in the memorandum of the Secretary of War for the Adjutant-General under date of April 15, 1902; also what action was taken by the President or the Secretary of War on the judgment of any court-martial so ordered, either approving or disapproving the same.

Also, that the records in full of the several following courts-martial ordered and held in the Philippine Islands be communicated, to wit:

That on Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith.
That on Maj. Edwin F. Glenn, Fifth Infantry.
That on Lieut. Edwin A. Hickman, First Cavalry.
That on Lieut. J. H. A. Day, Marine Corps.
That on Maj. L. W. T. Waller, of the Marine Corps.
That on Lieut. Preston Brown, Second Infantry.
That on Capt. James A. Ryan, Fifteenth Cavalry.
That on Lieut. —— Cooke.
That on Lieut. Julian E. Gaiyot.
That on Lieut. N. E. Cook, of the Philippine Scouts.
That on Lieut. W. Sinclair, battalion adjutant, Twenty-eighth Infantry.

Also, any record or reports of investigations which may be on file in the War Department relating to the case of the so-called "Father Augustine," alleged to have been put to death by Cornelius M. Brownell, formerly a captain of the Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, at Banate, island of Panay, province of Iloilo, in December, 1900; also any investigations made by the Department of Justice into the facts of such case, together with any legal conclusions reached thereon and reported to the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Philippines were, in line 12, after the word "that," to insert "summaries of;" in the same line, after the word "records," to strike out "in full" and insert "and testimony;" and on page 2, in line 1, after the words "Marine Corps," to strike out "that on Maj. L. W. T. Waller, of the Marine Corps;" so as to make the resolution read:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inform the Senate what courts-martial have been ordered and held in the Philippine Islands, and what judgments rendered by them in consequence of the dispatch sent by the Secretary of War to Major-General Chaffee, referred to in the memorandum of the Secretary of War for the Adjutant-General under date of April 15, 1902; also, what action was taken by the President or Secretary of War on the judgment of any court-martial so ordered, either approving or disapproving the same.

Also, that summaries of the records and testimony of the several following courts-martial ordered and held in the Philippine Islands be communicated, to wit: That on Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith; that on Maj. Edwin F. Glenn, Fifth Infantry; that on Lieut. Edwin A. Hickman, First Cavalry; that on Lieut. J. H. A. Day, Marine Corps; that on Lieut. Preston Brown, Second Infantry; that on Capt. James A. Ryan, Fifteenth Cavalry; that on Lieutenant Cooke; that on Lieut. Julian E. Gaiyot; that on Lieut. N. E. Cook, of the Philippine Scouts; that on Lieut. W. S. Sinclair, battalion adjutant, Twenty-eighth Infantry.

Also, any record or reports of investigations which may be on file in the War Department relating to the case of the so-called "Father Augustine," alleged to have been put to death by Cornelius M. Brownell, formerly a captain of the Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, at Banate, island of Panay, province of Iloilo, in December, 1900; also, any investigations made by the Department of Justice into the facts of such case, together with any legal conclusions reached thereon and reported to the War Department.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. LODGE. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Philippines, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] on the 16th instant, to report it adversely, with a request that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Philippines be authorized and instructed to sit during the recess of Congress for the purpose of prosecuting the investigation heretofore authorized by resolution of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be indefinitely postponed, in the absence of objection.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: I am informed that the Chair stated that the resolution submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], which I reported adversely, would be indefinitely postponed. I did not make that request. I asked that the resolution should go to the Calendar, as the minority desire that disposition to be made of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 7398) for the relief of W. W. Mansfield and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WELLINGTON introduced a bill (S. 7399) to regulate the hours of service and compensation of attendants and nurses at the Government Hospital for the Insane, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PENROSE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 7400) granting a pension to Samuel B. Hench;

A bill (S. 7401) granting a pension to George T. Young;

A bill (S. 7402) granting a pension to Ellen M. Malloy;
A bill (S. 7403) granting a pension to Julia A. Roberts;
A bill (S. 7404) granting a pension to Sarah Kirk (with the accompanying paper);
A bill (S. 7405) granting a pension to Thaddeus A. Smith; and
A bill (S. 7406) granting an increase of pension to Solomon R. Ruch (with the accompanying papers).

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 7407) to authorize the Donora Southern Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 7408) for the relief of Newton Woodyard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 7409) for the relief of the heirs of Robert M. Ely, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MASON. I introduce two bills at the request of Gen. R. G. Dyrenforth.

The bill (S. 7410) regulating the appointments of cadets to the Military and Naval Academies of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The bill (S. 7411) for the retirement of certain officers of the war of the rebellion was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 7413) granting an increase of pension to Edward Burns; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BAILEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $500 to reimburse the First National Bank of Navasota, Tex., for the loss of $500 in mutilated currency by fire at Charlottesville, Va., while said money was en route by mail, properly registered, to the Secretary of the Treasury for redemption, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $18,769.50 to pay the judgment heretofore rendered in the case of William J. Hill v. The United States, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the purchase of land adjacent to the military post at Fort Sheridan, Ill., for a rifle range, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEITFELD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 to reimburse George W. Dant, of the District of Columbia, for expenses incurred in defending himself against the charge of manslaughter growing out of the Ford Theater disaster of June 9, 1893, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. QUAY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate a sufficient sum of money to pay the claims of the States of Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, as found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury, for expenses incurred in raising volunteers, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $633.97 to compensate Chief Engineer Albert C. Engard, United States Navy (retired), for difference between sea pay and shore-duty pay, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (by request) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $58,950 to enable the Secretary of the Navy to test the efficiency of the Gathmann gun system, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment proposing to prohibit the adulteration and misbranding of food and drug products, intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for acquiring the Shafer property adjoining the post-office at Richmond, Va., from $100,000 to $115,000 in addition to the $75,000 already appropriated, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 to enable the Secretary of War to take suitable measures to commemorate the first half century anniversary of the commencement of the construction of the original ship canal at the falls of the St. Marys River, in the State of Michigan, on June 4, 1903, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HANNA subsequently, from the Committee on Commerce, favorably reported the foregoing amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. MASON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the Public Printer from $5,000 to $6,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCOMAS submitted an amendment providing that officers selected for appointments to fill vacancies in the grade of field officers in any of the staff departments shall be taken from officers on the active list not below the grade of captain who shall have seen not less than seven years' service as commissioned officers in the Marine Corps, instead of ten years' service, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi (for Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,098.16 to pay to the county of Gila, Ariz., the cost and expenses incurred by that county in the prosecution of Indians under the act of March 3, 1885, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Nevada submitted an amendment proposing to provide for the treaty obligations imposed by article 9 of the award of the tribunal of arbitration constituted by the treaty of Washington, February 29, 1892, and made by the arbitrators at Paris, August 16, 1893, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WELLINGTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 7142) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DANIEL submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 7142) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him as a substitute for the convention with Colombia for the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, signed January 22, 1903; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk, who shall be an expert typewriter, at an annual salary at the rate of $1,400, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that on Thursday next, at 2 o'clock p. m., a vote be taken upon the omnibus statehood bill and all amendments now pending or then offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent——

Mr. KEAN. I think it had better be postponed——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the request be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not stated the request.

Mr. KEAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on Thursday next, at 2 o'clock, without further debate, a vote be had on the omnibus statehood bill and all amendments then pending or then offered. Is there objection?

Mr. KEAN. I trust the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me to finish my remarks before he asks for a vote on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made

CAROLINE WEINHEIMER.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill (S. 7246) granting a pension to Caroline Weinheimer be indefinitely postponed, as the beneficiary has died since the bill was reported.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES R. ALLEN.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent that a little pension bill may be taken up and passed. If the party is ever to get any benefit from the bill, it ought to be passed at this time. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (S. 5369) granting an increase of pension to Charles R. Allen.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles R. Allen, late of Company A, Second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCREASED PENSIONS FOR LOSS OF LIMBS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4850) to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States, or are totally disabled in the same, numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, and 8, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 8.

That the House recede from its amendment to the title of the bill and agree to an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert:

"An act to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
P. J. McCUMBER,
JAMES P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
W. A. CALDERHEAD,
ROBERT W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 21st instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 4577) for the relief of William McCarty Little;

An act (S. 7245) amending the act of June 19, 1888, providing for the erection of a public building at Bridgeport, Conn.; and

The joint resolution (S. R. 108) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional ground for the post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Jacksonville, Fla.

FIRST INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONVENTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, concerning the transactions of the First International Sanitary Convention of the American Republics, held at Washington in December, 1902.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 23, 1903.

VETO MESSAGE—FRANCIS S. DAVIDSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without approval, Senate bill 1115, entitled "An act for the relief of Francis S. Davidson, late first lieutenant, Ninth United States Cavalry."

The beneficiary of this bill was in the service for about nine years ending in December, 1875. He has not been in the service for the past twenty-seven years.

When in the service he appears to have been an insubordinate and unprofitable officer. He was at one time a cadet at the West Point Academy, and was discharged January 31, 1865, by reason of deficiency in study and conduct. The Academic board remarked of him at that time:

"This is the second deficiency of Cadet Davidson in conduct, and he having shown himself regardless of the leniency heretofore extended to him, the board recommends that he be discharged."

From June 9 to October 31, 1865, after the end of active hostilities of the civil war, he was a lieutenant of volunteers. He was appointed second lieutenant in the Regular Army March 7, 1867; promoted to be first lieutenant July 31, 1867.

On the 20th of June, 1868, he was tried by court-martial for "Neglect of duty, disobedience of orders, and conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline," and acquitted. The finding of acquittal was disapproved by the reviewing authority, with the remark that the conduct of the accused "was not only irregular, but insubordinate and disrespectful to his commanding officer."

On the 4th of January, 1872, he was again tried by court-martial and found guilty of disobedience of orders and violation of the sixth article of war, and was suspended from rank and pay for one month and reprimanded in general orders.

On November 15, 1875, he was again tried by court-martial and found guilty of "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," consisting of breach of arrest and gambling with enlisted men. Upon this he was dismissed the service, from which he has remained separated for now more than twenty-seven years.

No act of special gallantry or conspicuous service marked the short period during which he was an officer of the Army. He is 56 years of age. This bill proposes to put him upon the retired list, where he would be supported for the remainder of his life at public expense without rendering any return. It does not appear that he is subject to any physical disability incurred in the line of duty or otherwise. The treatment thus proposed is denied by law to all the officers whose service has been continuous and faithful, for they are not entitled to the benefits of the retired list until after forty years' service, or reaching the age of 64, or being physically disabled.

That an officer with this record should be rewarded is wholly without justification, and if that should be done it would involve a confusion between the treatment accorded to loyal and faithful service and that accorded to insubordination and unfaithful service, which could not fail to be most prejudicial to the morale and efficiency of the Army.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 21, 1903.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. QUAY on the 18th instant, as follows:

Whereas House bill 12543, to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, has been under discussion in the Senate since the 10th day of December last, and must fail unless voted upon at an early date:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that by unanimous consent a date and hour prior to the 2d of March next should be fixed for a final vote upon the bill and all amendments that are pending or may be offered thereto.

Mr. CULLOM. I object to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that it may go over, retaining its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the resolution may go over, retaining its place. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ELMER E. FORESHAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DUBOIS on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Civil Service Commission is hereby directed to furnish to the United States Senate a statement of the charges and evidence on account of which Elmer E. Foreshay was dismissed from the surveyor-general's office of Idaho.

Also, whether under the ruling of the civil service he is eligible to any other position in the Government service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho, when the resolution was last before the Senate, asked that it might follow the resolution submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. GALLINGER. In the absence of the Senator from Idaho I will take the liberty to ask that the resolution may go over, retaining its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to that request, and the order is made.

STATUES TO COUNT PULASKI AND BARON VON STEUBEN.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16) to provide for the erection at Washington, D. C., of bronze equestrian statues to the memory of the late Brig. Gen. Count Casimir Pulaski and Baron Steuben.

Mr. President, I regret that the pressure of the public business is so great that I am unable to speak at length upon this bill. I am fully aware, however, that it needs no advocacy, for the American people cherish the memory of Brig. Gen. Count Casimir Pulaski, the great Polish patriot who rendered such illustrious service in the sublime cause of American independence.

Nor is any word necessary to secure the passage of the bill to erect a statue in honor of the memory of Baron von Steuben, who wrote with his sword a brilliant record in American history.

It is a happy circumstance that both Pulaski and Steuben are associated in the bill, consideration of which I now ask. They possessed the entire confidence of George Washington, and gave powerful aid to the exalted cause of freedom upon the Western Continent.

We are a grateful people, and we will erect here in the nation's capital monuments which shall fitly commemorate the services of Count Pulaski and Baron von Steuben, and which shall stand forever in the shadow of the majestic shaft erected to the memory of their great commander, George Washington.

I hope, Mr. President, that the bill may be given present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there shall be erected in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, a statue of Brig. Gen. Count Casimir Pulaski, of Poland, who came to America and, after declaring his intention to become a citizen of the Republic, offered his sword to Washington, under whose leadership in the great struggle for American independence he lost his life at the siege of Savannah, Ga., October 11, 1779; and for the purpose of procuring and erecting said statue with a suitable pedestal, and for the preparation of a site, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of a commission to be composed of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and the president of the Pulaski monument Polish central committee.

SEC. 2. That there shall be erected in the city of Washington, D. C., a statue of Frederick William Augustus Henry Ferdinand, Baron von Steuben, major-general and inspector-general in the Continental Army; and for the purpose of procuring and erecting said statue with a suitable pedestal, and for the preparation of a site, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of a commission to be composed of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-seventh Congress.

SEC. 3. That the commissions herein created are empowered, respectively, to select sites for the statues authorized by this act on ground belonging to the Government: Provided, That said statues shall not be located in the grounds of the Capitol or Library of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the erection at Washington, D. C., of statues to the memory of Brigadier-General Count Pulaski and Major-General Baron von Steuben, of the Continental Army."

IMPORTATION OF BREEDING ANIMALS.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16656) regulating the importation of breeding animals.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. CULLOM. I have had many letters opposing the bill, and I think that for the present I ought to object to its consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the bill ought to go over. There is much opposition to it among farmers.

Mr. HARRIS. I think farmers are entirely in favor of it.

Mr. CULLOM. No; I have had letters this morning on the subject.

Mr. KEAN. Does the Senator from Illinois object?

Mr. CULLOM. I object for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois objects.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 7390, which I have just reported and which is at the desk.

Mr. MASON. I gave notice that at this hour I would ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill. The Senator from South Dakota says the bill he wishes to call up is short and will not provoke discussion, and I will yield to him.

Mr. GAMBLE. I do not think it will provoke any discussion. A similar bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. How long is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ten pages.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor and asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we ought to go on with the bill now.

Mr. GAMBLE. I will waive it for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts objects.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 16990—the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Commitee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 16990) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with amendments.

Mr. MASON. There was an agreement made, and by unanimous consent so far as I was concerned, that one measure relating to public buildings, which it is necessary to get over to the House, shall be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, one word before my colleague yields to the Senator from Indiana. As I understand it, the Post-Office appropriation bill has the noted statehood bill as an amendment at the head of it.

Mr. LODGE. That is the first amendment. We have not reached it yet.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; it is the first amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The Secretary has not begun to read the bill yet.

Mr. CULLOM. What I wish to say (and I think the Senator from Pennsylvania will agree to what I state) is that that amendment may be passed over and the rest of the bill disposed of. Let it be passed over for the time being.

Mr. MASON. That is the understanding.

Mr. LODGE. Would it not be just as well to begin the reading of the bill and allow the chairman of the committee to state the request?

Mr. CULLOM. It is a long amendment and it comes first.

Mr. QUAY. It is not worth while to read the statehood bill again.

Mr. LODGE. I am not going to have it read.

Mr. MASON. If I may be permitted, I wish to say that the intention and understanding is, and I shall ask it, to have the first amendment, known as the omnibus statehood bill, passed over without discussion, reserving the right to make a point of order upon it.

Mr. LODGE. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MASON. The point of order will be reserved on the amendment.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MASON. I agreed to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask leave out of order to report a bill from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. RAWLINS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill if the proposed statehood amendment has been withdrawn?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been withdrawn.

Mr. QUAY. Certainly not. It is passed over for the present, while the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the subsequent parts of the bill. The statehood amendment will come up in its order after the other amendments to the bill are disposed of. That is the understanding.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report an original bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. 7414) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, was read the first time by title and the second time at length; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. DUBOIS. I wish to offer some amendments to the bill. I notice that in the omnibus public-buildings bill that passed two years ago Idaho was the only State left out, and Idaho is the only State that is left out now.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Did the Senator have any amendments to propose or any bill to introduce with respect to buildings in Idaho?

Mr. DUBOIS. No; I did not, for the reason that I did not think it should be the policy of the Government to erect public buildings in small towns; but if it is the policy, the towns that I will mention in Idaho ought to be provided for, because in addition to the post-office needs of them we have land offices and

United States courts and revenue officers and other governmental offices.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will state that that is an entirely new proposition, and there are no new propositions carried in this bill. If the Senator has a meritorious case and will introduce a bill at the coming session of Congress, the committee will give it the most careful consideration.

Mr. DUBOIS. I call the attention of the Senator to page 9, "for the use and accommodation of United States governmental offices," etc. Then, below, "United States post-office at Sterling, Ill.; United States post-office at Champaign, Ill.," etc.

Mr. CULLOM. I will say to my friend from Idaho that these items were in the original bill passed at the last session.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator from Illinois is correct.

Mr. DUBOIS. That I understand perfectly; and I say Idaho was the only State which was left out. Idaho and Delaware, I think, were the only States left out of the last bill. Now that the policy is being carrried forward, I do not see why these towns in Idaho, in which Government business is transacted in addition to the post-office business, should not be included in the bill. If it is the general policy, as it seems to be, I do not see why there should be any objection to inserting three towns in Idaho, two at $25,000 each and another at $40,000, when bills introduced do go through the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and it seems to be the settled policy to expend money for this purpose in such towns.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator had introduced a bill, as was done in other cases, and the matter had been brought to the attention of the committee, the needs of the public service in Idaho would certainly have been provided for at the last session of Congress.

Now, as I said before, this bill does not take up original propositions. The propositions to which the Senator refers are absolutely new. There are many others like them in different States. It is the purpose of the committee to deal with them, as is usually done, at the long session of Congress, and if the Senator will bring the matters to which he refers to the attention of the Senate and the committee by appropriate bills at the next session I have no doubt they will have all proper consideration.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from Idaho will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. QUAY. There is no objection to having the unfinished business temporarily laid aside without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, the committee has established the policy of erecting public buildings in the smaller towns, even in those which have only a post-office as a Government institution. As I said, in the towns for which I propose to provide in Idaho there will be other Government offices in the building besides the post-office. I do not see why, after the precedent which has been established, you should refuse now to put in the only State which is not in the bill. I would maintain the position of any Senator against any of these provisions, but it seems that all the other States were provided for.

I do not believe that the Government ought to erect these buildings. I do not think it is of very much advantage to the towns, and I think there is too much of it done. But inasmuch as all of the States are provided for, I wish to offer some amendments for Idaho, and the arguments which have been good for the others are good now for Idaho without offering a separate bill and going before the committee, knowing in advance that it will accept the arguments.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I did not want to offer an amendment. I desire to say simply that I understood the Post-Office appropriation bill was temporarily laid aside with the understanding that this bill would not take time in debate.

Mr. MASON. That was my understanding, and if there is to be any extended debate I must insist upon going on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. If there is to be debate and amendments offered generally to the bill, I do not wish to delay the appropriation bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not wish to interfere with the pending bill and I shall not debate it at all. I have stated the case, and if Senators want to vote down my amendments that ends it with me. I shall not occupy any time at all except to offer my amendments.

Mr. MASON. All right.

Mr. DUBOIS. On page 9, after line 19, I move to insert:

Building for use of governmental offices at Pocatello, Idaho, $40,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to lay the amendment on the table. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HEITFELD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is agreed to, and the amendment is laid on the table.

Mr. DUBOIS. On page 9, after line 19, I move to insert:

Building for use of governmental offices at Moscow, Idaho, $25,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DUBOIS. On page 9, after line 19, I move to insert:

Building for use of governmental offices at Lewiston, Idaho, $25,000.

I will say to Senators that all of these towns have United States courts, internal-revenue offices, and land offices, besides post-offices, and that Idaho is the only State which is not provided for in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. QUAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and in connection with it, before I am laid on the table, I desire, if the Senate does not direct to the contrary, to have the Secretary read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will first be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to acquire such land as he may deem necessary for the enlargement of the Federal building site in the city of Lancaster, State of Pennsylvania, and to cause the post-office building located on said site to be extended and enlarged at a total cost to the United States of not to exceed $125,000, including all necessary changes in, alterations of, and repairs to the present building, and of the heating and plumbing systems therein, which may be incident to such extension or enlargement of said building.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, that amendment was prepared at the Treasury Department and it was forwarded in the inclosed communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I ask shall be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 12, 1903.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: This Department has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 10th instant, requesting a report in connection with H. R. 17331, authorizing the acquisition of additional land and the erection of an addition to the Federal building at Lancaster, Pa., for the use of the post-office and other Government offices, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $125,000, and in reply I have to submit the following:

An agent of this Department has recently made an inspection of the public building at Lancaster, and it appears that the present accommodations, both for the post-office and the internal revenue, are too small for the proper transaction of the public business, and that additional room is necessary.

It is estimated that a two-story and basement addition of 50 by 50 feet in dimensions at the rear of the building will provide sufficient additional accommodations for the service, and that such an addition, with the necessary incidental changes in the present building, will cost $125,000, including the cost of additional land. With regard to additional land in connection with the proposed extension, it is estimated that, in order to provide for the erection of such extension, and to preserve the present fire limit of 40 feet, it will be necessary to acquire additional land adjoining the present site in the rear, at a cost of about $10,000.

Estimated cost of addition, including necessary incidental changes in present building and additional land, $125,000.

Referring to section 2 of said bill, which provides that proposals for the sale of land "suitable for said site" shall be invited by public advertisement, etc., it is suggested that said section be stricken out, for the reason that it is obviously unnecessary to advertise in this case, the only available property being in the rear of the Government site.

Sections 3, 4, 5, and 6, requiring that the sites proposed shall be examined by an agent of the Department, or, under certain circumstances, by a commission of not more than three persons, and providing for the payment of the expenses of advertising, traveling, etc., should also be stricken from the bill under consideration.

Sections 7, 8 and 9, providing for the preparation of sketch plans, drawings, specifications, and detailed estimates; for the vesting of title, for the cession of jurisdiction over the property, etc., are considered unnecessary, and should, in the opinion of this Department, be stricken out, the objects sought to be secured by the sections indicated being fully covered by existing statutes.

With regard to section 10, which provides that the building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 20 feet, you are advised that on the East Marion street side, or rear, of the building, the Government owns 40 feet of ground, which is now used for mail wagons delivering and receiving mail. Adjoining the Government site in this direction is private property 53 feet wide by 120 feet deep, which the Department is informed can be secured for not to exceed $10,000. Between the Government building and the adjoining land on Duke street there remains 41 feet clear, and immediately joining the Government site in this direction a new church has been erected, making land there unavailable for the purposes of an addition to the present site.

The act providing for the public building at Lancaster requires a 40-foot fire limit, and as such protection is considered necessary, the Department deems the maintaining of a limit of at least the distance indicated as very essential where it is possible to do so.

The Department is further of the opinion that the rear end of the building is the only place where an addition can be constructed to meet the requirements of the service, without marring the present proportions of the building.

In this connection the Department begs to inclose a draft of a bill which, it is thought, will more readily accomplish the apparent objects sought to be secured by the bill under consideration.

Respectfully,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

Mr. QUAY. Now, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury states the immediate necessity of this improvement, recommends that legislation for that purpose be had, and sends here the draft of the amendment which I have offered. I think, under the circumstances, the Senator from Indiana is entirely justifiable in making this an exception to the general rule which he has adopted.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It would be impossible, under the rule which has been adopted, to accept the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The case is undoubtedly a meritorious one. There are many others like it. If the Senator will introduce a bill covering the case at the coming session of Congress the committee will be glad to consider it, and from the showing made will no doubt consider it favorably. But it can not accept the amendment now, and therefore——

Mr. QUAY. But in the meantime the business of the country is suffering. The Senator from Indiana says that we are to be remitted to the next Congress. When or how the next Congress will be able to afford the relief the Senator from Indiana certainly can not predict. It seems to me that instead of rejecting these meritorious amendments on the ground that bills have not been offered, he ought to remedy the trouble throughout the country by accepting the amendments. What is practically the difference whether they come in as amendments to the bill or as original bills I can not see. If there is a public necessity for the legislation, it matters not in what shape it is reported.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to lay the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to page 8, line 11. I have been informed by a member of the House committee that this was taken from the House bill and that the appropriation was intended to be $80,000 instead of $75,000; that $80,000 is the least amount which the architect says it can be built for, and that the committee so intended.

I give this information as I got it, from a member of the House committee, as the reason for substituting $80,000 for $75,000, that it was by mistake put at $75,000. I hope the Senate will agree to strike out $75,000 in line 12, on page 8, and insert $80,000 in place of it. The estimate is $80,000, and the architect stated that that was the amount for which he could contract for the construction of the building.

As I said before, a member of the House committee stated that it was a mistake. That is the only information I have in regard to it. I should like to move to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$80,000."

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The information the committee had was to the effect that $75,000 would be sufficient, and under the instructions from the committee under which I am acting, I could not accept the amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Does the Senator say that he has examined the architect's report and that he thinks $75,000 will be sufficient?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. BERRY. My information is that the architect has stated that $80,000 is the amount required, and that that is the lowest sum at which the contract could be made.

I state furthermore that I have been informed that a member of the House committee has stated that it was intended that $80,000 should be appropriated, but by some mistake the item went into the bill at $75,000. I do not state that to be a fact, but I say that I got the information in the way I have said, that $80,000 is the lowest amount at which the architect estimated the work could be done. I submit the matter to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should be glad to accommodate the Senator from Arkansas, but I am not able to do so at the present time.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Through an oversight I omitted to offer a committee provision. At the bottom of page 4, line 25, I now move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 25, it is proposed to insert the following:

United States court-house, post-office, and land office at Fargo, N. Dak., an additional sum of $80,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I hope the Senator from Indiana may be willing to accept the two little amendments which I desire to offer. On page 11, line 14, after the word "dollars," where it first occurs, I move to insert:

United States post-office, Gainesville, Ga., $50,000.
United States post-office and court-house at Valdosta, Ga., $100,000.

I desire to state to the Senator from Indiana that there is a court-house at Valdosta, Ga. The House bill contains both of these items, and I sincerely hope that the Senator will allow them to be placed upon this bill.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Those are new propositions, are they not?

Mr. CLAY. They are new propositions, but I will state to the Senator from Indiana that they are meritorious; that they were unanimously adopted by the House committee, and a bill is now on the Calendar containing these two items.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I have no doubt the two cases mentioned by the honorable Senator are meritorious, but there are many others like them, and the committee will be glad to consider them at the next session of Congress. They can not be considered on this bill, and I hope the Senator will not press them.

Mr. CLAY. I sincerely regret that the Senator from Indiana can not accept the amendments; but as the Senator says the amendments are meritorious and will have proper attention at the long session of Congress, I do not care to imperil the passage of this bill, and so I will not press the amendments any further at this time.

Mr. BERRY. In view of the statement I have made that the appropriation of $75,000 for a United States post-office and court-house at Batesville, Ark., was a mistake and that the amount was intended to be $80,000, as I am informed by a member of the House committee, and in view of the fact that I have also been informed that the architect says that he can not begin the building unless $80,000 is appropriated, I move to strike out "$75,000," in line 12, page 8, and insert "$80,000." It is simply a difference of $5,000. As the architect has put it in that way, I think it would be a misfortune if the small sum of $5,000 should prevent the commencement of the construction of the building.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, in line 12, after the words "dollars to," it is proposed to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "eighty," so that, if amended, the paragraph will read:

United States post-office and court-house at Batesville, Ark., from $70,000 to $80,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment. [Putting the question]. By sound, the ayes have it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask for a division.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I regret that the Senator should interpose a motion which may imperil the entire bill. This bill has not been through the other House, and it must pass here and go there speedily if it is to pass and become a law at this session of Congress.

Mr. BERRY. I understand that.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am advised that if the bill is to be amended or materially changed, its success will be jeopardized in the other branch.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator had an amendment put on the bill just now appropriating $80,000.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That was ordered by the committee.

Mr. BERRY. My amendment has been ordered by a majority of the Senate, which is a still higher authority.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator insists on the amendment, I shall ask for a division upon the question. I ask that the question may be again put, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after line 14, it is proposed to insert as a new paragraph the following:

United States post-office at Portsmouth, Va., from $15,000 to $25,000.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief explanation of this amendment and the reasons why it is offered at this time.

My colleague [Mr. MARTIN] and myself alike appreciate the situation of this bill and participate in the desire that the extra things which have called it forth shall not be imperiled by the introduction of new and litigated matters.

While there are quite a number of post-offices contemplated in our State, which have proceeded in some degree, we have on this account refrained from presenting as amendments to this bill even those cases which we thought should not be delayed; but we deemed this particular amendment as to the city of Portsmouth one demanded by the interests of the public service and one which should not be delayed until another session.

The city of Portsmouth has nearly 20,000 people; it is an old Virginia seaport town; there is established there one of the great naval works of the United States, and it has been certainly not less than ten years since one or the other House of Congress has passed bills for the establishment of a post-office in that city. There is no city which has been more patient in awaiting the event, and none, as I conceive, more deserving of this recognition.

The situation at present is just this: By an act of Congress of last year, June 6, 1902, provision was made for the acquisition of a site for a building at Portsmouth. No provision whatever has been made for the building itself, but the initial step of providing a site at Portsmouth was ordered to be taken by the act of Congress of June 6, 1902.

Now, here is what the Treasury Department says upon this subject, and it is verified by the personal knowledge of both my colleague and myself, who have had correspondence on this matter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 28, 1903.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: This Department has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your request, dated the 24th instant, for reports in connection with a number of bills relating to public buildings, and in reply to that portion of your letter which provides for an appropriation of $10,000 in addition to the amount already appropriated ($15,000) for the purchase of a site for the Federal building to be erected at Portsmouth, Va., you are advised as follows:

After the passage of the act of Congress approved June 6, 1902 (public-building act), which provided, among other things, for the acquisition of a site at Portsmouth, Va., at a cost not to exceed $15,000, an agent of the Department was sent to that city for the purpose of making a personal examination and report in connection with property suitable for the purpose. It appears from the report submitted by said agent that a suitable site can not be secured within the limit of $15,000 fixed by the act referred to, and the Department is of the opinion that a satisfactory site will cost approximately $25,000.

Respectfully, O. L. SPAULDING, Acting Secretary.

Thus, Mr. President, the expectation of years, and the provision tentatively made for years for the acquisition of the site at Portsmouth, Va., is now hung up and delayed by the deficiency of appropriation of $15,000 for the purchase of a site. Here we have the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, Gen. O. L. Spaulding, in which he sets forth these facts.

It seems to me, sir, to be the very object and scope of this bill to comprehend cases of this sort, where the delay in public work settled upon is occasioned and the work hindered by insufficiency of appropriation. It is a small amount that is asked. To delay such matters from year to year is not good administration. It must come, in the nature of things, as a matter of course, in one session or another; and now that we are dealing with it, while the subject is fresh, is the time, in my judgment, in which sound legislation would add this item to the bill. I hope, therefore, that the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will not object to doing so, and that it will be permitted to be put upon the bill without opposition on his part.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] understands very well that the committee was desirous of dealing with entire candor and fairness with both him and the proposition to which he has referred. The subject received very careful consideration at the hands of the committee, and without detaining the Senate to go into the reasons why the committee could not assent to the proposition of the Senator, I will say that I hope he will not press his request at the present time.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate but a very few moments. I do not understand why it is that an item of this sort, which is directly within the scope and purpose of this bill, should be excluded.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I will tell the Senator if he wishes to know. The committee has information that there is a real estate deal and combination there to run up the price on the Government. That is the reason why the committee is opposed to the increase.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, neither the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds nor anyone else has any authentic information or any reliable information or any correct information to that effect.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The information may not be correct, but it seems entirely sufficient to justify the committee in excluding the proposition.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I think I know as much about the situation at Portsmouth and that my colleague knows as much about the situation at Portsmouth as the people who are coming here and trying to force on that community an unfit site for this public building. The only information, I think, which reached the ears of the Senator from Indiana came from a man who is trying to put on the Government a site which is grossly unfit for the purpose, which can be bought for $15,000. The very best people in that city, the presidents of banks, the most solid, substantial, respectable, and public-spirited people in that city, assure me that there is no such scheme as that alluded to by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. President, this bill, as I have stated, is in aid of the legislation of the last session of Congress. I can readily see how a bill framed in that way ought to be kept within those lines; but this is a case exactly in the class for the relief of which this bill was framed, and is being pressed here now. It is to supplement that which proved ineffective under the legislation had at the last session of Congress.

At the last session of Congress $15,000 was appropriated to acquire a site for the building in Portsmouth. The Treasury Department endeavored to acquire a site at Portsmouth within the limit of cost fixed by the legislation of the last session of Congress; that is, $15,000. It sent its agent to the city of Portsmouth for the purpose of investigating conditions there and purchasing the site, if a suitable one could be had at $15,000.

That agent, after thorough investigation, reported that a suitable site could not be had for $15,000, but that $25,000 would be necessary if a suitable site was acquired. I respectfully submit to the Senate that the official investigation of the Treasury Department about this matter, which is corroborated and sustained by my colleague and myself from actual information possessed by us about the conditions prevailing at that point—I say that that position, fortified in that way, is more entitled to the respect of this Senate than the vague insinuation that there is a real-estate deal in connection with this matter, as to which there is absolutely no color of correctness.

If this improvement is to go on at Portsmouth, $25,000 is necessary. The Treasury Department so reports in an official communication; and I ask the Senate to recognize that official communication and to do in the case of Portsmouth what has been done in dozens of other places just like it throughout the United States, where reports have been made that the amount authorized at the last session of Congress has proved inadequate and insufficient, and that the improvement is blocked and can not proceed until an increase is made in the appropriation. When such an official report is made by the Treasury Department asking for this increase, I submit the Senate ought to give it.

There is nothing whatever to justify the insinuation made by the chairman of the committee. I have taken pains to make a careful investigation into the matter, and I have information which satisfies me beyond the possibility of doubt that there is nothing whatever in such a suggestion.

This is a meritorious amendment. The necessity for it has been investigated by the Treasury Department, and the report has been made that $25,000 is necessary, whereas only $15,000 has been authorized. We simply ask that the recommendation of the Department be accepted and that we may have the margin of cost increased from $15,000 to $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes have it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I ask for a division upon the proposition.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 17, noes 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Kean,	Quarles,
Alger,	Dillingham,	Kearns,	Quay,
Allison,	Dolliver,	Kittredge,	Rawlins,
Bacon,	Dryden,	McComas,	Simmons,
Bailey,	Dubois,	McCumber,	Simon,
Bard,	Elkins,	McLaurin, Miss.	Spooner,
Bate,	Fairbanks,	Mallory,	Stewart,

Burrows,	Foster, Wash.	Mason,	Teller,
Carmack,	Frye,	Millard,	Tillman,
Clark, Wyo.	Gamble,	Nelson,	Vest,
Clay,	Gibson,	Penrose,	Warren,
Cockrell,	Hale,	Perkins,	Wellington,
Culberson,	Harris,	Pettus,	Wetmore.
Cullom,	Heitfeld,	Proctor,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The Chair will again put the question on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

The question being again put, there were, on a division—ayes 19, noes 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If Senators will vote, the Chair will put the question once more.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, has a Senator who is paired and whose pair is not present the right to stand up and be counted on a division?

Mr. SPOONER. I should have voted but for the fact that I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. This seems to be a party division. If the yeas and nays were called, in his absence I would not be at liberty to vote, and I did not conceive myself at liberty to vote in any way in this matter.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I think the quickest way to settle this matter is to vote by yeas and nays. I therefore demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last vote has developed the fact that there is no quorum in the Senate, and therefore no business except a motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. MASON. Or a call of the Senate, Mr. President. Can we not have that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Dillingham,	Kittredge,	Quay,
Alger,	Dryden,	McComas,	Rawlins,
Bacon,	Dubois,	McCumber,	Simmons,
Bailey,	Elkins,	McLaurin, Miss.	Spooner,

Clay,	Heitfeld,	Platt, Conn.	Wetmore.
Culberson,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,
Cullom,	Kean,	Proctor,
Daniel,	Kearns,	Quarles,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-seven Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEITFELD (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I do not think he is in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], but he is a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and gave his assent to the bill as reported, accompanied with the understanding that it should not be amended. I, therefore, will take the liberty of voting. I feel that he would vote upon the same side of the question that I would. Therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. MCCOMAS (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who is not present, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CLAY (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. CLAY. I withdraw my vote, being paired with that Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I did not see present the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], with whom I have a pair. I should like to know if he has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed he has not voted.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bacon,	Culberson,	Gibson,	Morgan,
Bailey,	Daniel,	Harris,	Pettus,
Bate,	Dubois,	McLaurin, Miss.	Quay,
Berry,	Elkins,	Mallory,	Rawlins,
Carmack,	Foster, La.	Martin,	Teller.

NAYS—34.

Aldrich,	Foster, Wash.	Kittredge,	Quarles,
Alger,	Frye,	McCumber,	Simon,
Bard,	Gallinger,	Mason,	Spooner,
Burrows,	Gamble,	Millard,	Vest,
Burton.	Hale,	Nelson,	Warren.
Clark, Wyo.	Hanna,	Penrose,	Wellington,
Cullom,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,	Wetmore.
Dryden,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.
Fairbanks,	Kearns,	Proctor,

NOT VOTING—34.

Allison,	Depew,	Jones, Nev.	Pritchard,
Beveridge,	Dietrich,	Lodge,	Scott,
Blackburn,	Dillingham,	McComas,	Simmons,
Burnham,	Dolliver,	McEnery,	Stewart,
Clapp,	Foraker,	McLaurin, S. C.	Taliaferro,
Clark, Mont.	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Tillman,
Clay,	Heitfeld,	Money,	Turner.
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Patterson,
Deboe,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, N. Y.

So Mr. DANIEL'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the proper place:

For United States post-office at Hagerstown, Md., $20,000, for purchase of a site.

For United States post-office at Westminster, Md., $10,000, for purchase of a site.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the amendment. In the House bill as new items these two propositions are inserted.

Mr. TELLER. We can not hear what the Senator from Maryland is saying.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I understood from the chairman in his statement this morning that the committee has rigidly excluded every new item.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. With reference to new sites?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Yes.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No new site is included in the bill.

Mr. MCCOMAS. None whatever?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. None whatever.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Then these new sites would properly come in on next year's bill.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Will the chairman, then, give them careful attention?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The committee will then give them careful consideration.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Then I withdraw the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland withdraws the amendment.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I send to the desk an amendment to the bill; it was omitted from the print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, after line 24, it is proposed to insert:

For the completion of the United States court-house and post-office at Omaha, Nebr., $5,000 additional to the present authorized limit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 3560) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1893, and amended April 1, 1896, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WANGER, Mr.

SHERMAN, and Mr. ADAMSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

SAFETY APPLIANCES ON RAILROADS.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the bill just received from the House of Representatives relating to safety appliances on railroads lie on the table until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DEPEW in the chair). If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16990) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment of the committee will be passed over, and the reading will commence at the end of the amendment.

The Secretary began the reading of the bill at line 10, on page 46.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 46, line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "fifty-three;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "and the salary of the postmaster of the city of Chicago is hereby fixed at $8,000 per annum;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to postmasters, $21,753,000, and the salary of the postmaster of the city of Chicago is hereby fixed at $8,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 8, after the word "offices," to strike out "One" and insert "Two;" in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand;" in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "each;" in the same line, before the word "at," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "sixteen;" and in line 22, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ninety-three thousand six hundred" and insert "ninety-three thousand one hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Salary and allowance division: For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices: Two, at $4,000 each; 16, at $3,000; 6, at $2,500 each; 4, at $2,000 each; 14, at $1,900 each; 20, at $1,800 each; 35, at $1,700 each; 85, at $1,600 each; 100, at $1,500 each; 80, at $1,400 each; 150, at $1,300 each; 300, at $1,200 each; 310, at $1,100 each; and 400, at $1,000 each; in all, for assistant postmasters, $1,895,100.

Mr. MASON. I desire, on behalf of the committee, on the recommendation of the Department, to offer an amendment to the amendment. It is a mere matter of form. I move to amend the amendment by striking out, in line 8, page 47, the words "Two, at $4,000 each" and inserting:

One, at New York, N. Y., $4,000; one, at Chicago, Ill., $4,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I desire in this connection to have published in the RECORD a letter from the Department explaining the amendment.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1903.

Hon. W. E. MASON,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

SIR: Referring to the matter of increasing the salaries of the assistant postmasters at New York and Chicago, I would suggest that on page 47, lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, in the act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, the language be changed so as to read:

"One at New York, N. Y., $4,000; one at Chicago, Ill., $4,000."

If this is not done it will probably be necessary to amend the classification act of March 3, 1889, to make the appropriation operative.

Very respectfully,

W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
Acting Postmaster-General.

The reading was continued to the end of line 19 on page 48.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I believe it is in order to offer an amendment at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order until after the committee amendments shall have been disposed of.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought they had been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, they have not yet been disposed of. The Chair will recognize the Senator as soon as they are.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, on page 55, line 12, before the word "of," to strike out "One superintendent" and insert "Two superintendents;" in line 13, before the word "of," to strike out "one superintendent" and insert "two superintendents;" in line 14, before the word "of," to strike out "one superintendent" and insert "two superintendents;" in line 15, before the word "of," to strike out "one superintendent" and insert "two superintendents;" and in line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve thousand eight hundred" and insert "twenty-five thousand six hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Two superintendents of money-order division, 2 superintendents of registry, 2 superintendents of mails, and 2 superintendents of delivery, at $3,200 each, $25,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 1, to increase the total appropriation for clerk hire in post-offices from $19,801,900 to $19,814,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred and ten" and insert "three hundred;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert:

of which not more than $210,000 shall be expended in rentals of machines: Provided, That no canceling machine shall be rented at an annual rental exceeding $400: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall, whenever possible, purchase canceling machines, and shall report fully to the next Congress in regard to said machines, whether they should be purchased or rented, all facts connected therewith, and what steps ought to be taken to protect the interests of the Government therein.

So as to make the clause read:

For rental or purchase of canceling machines, $300,000, of which not more than $210,000 shall be expended in rentals of machines: Provided, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 15, before the word "allowance," to insert "or automobile;" so as to make the clause read:

For horse hire or automobile allowance, $750,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 1, before the word "at," to strike out "seven special agents in charge of divisions" and insert "ten division superintendents;" and in line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixteen thousand eight hundred" and insert "twenty-four thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Rural free-delivery service: For compensation to 10 division superintendents, at $2,400 each, $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 18, to increase the total appropriation for rural free-delivery service from $12,619,300 to $12,626,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 9, after the word "Postmaster-General," to insert "including necessary traveling expenses for the First Assistant Postmaster-General within the District of Columbia;" so as to make the clause read:

Miscellaneous items in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, including necessary traveling expenses for the First Assistant Postmaster-General within the District of Columbia, $2,000, of which sum not exceeding $300 may be used for the purchase of city directories and books of reference.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, after line 13, to insert:

For hire of a vehicle to be under the supervision of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 64, line 24, to reduce the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes, of which a sum not exceeding $100,000 may be employed to pay freight on postal cards, stamped envelopes, etc., from $38,242,000 to $36,260,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 4, to increase the appropriation for the salary of one General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service from $3,500 to $4,000, in line 5 to increase the appropriation for the salary of one Assistant General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service from $3,000 to $3,500, and on page 66, line 5, to increase the total appropriation for the Railway Mail Service from $11,933,301 to $11,934,301.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 2, after the word "Newton," to insert "and Fort Scott;" so as to make the clause read:

For continuing necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton and Fort Scott, Kans., $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. MASON. By authority of the committee I will withdraw the amendment,

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the chairman why it is withdrawn.

Mr. MASON. I will explain it. Senators will remember that it was stated before the committee that the $25,000 which was allowed as a subsidy for the fast mail train to Newton, Kans., included the connecting road to Fort Scott. It was also stated to the committee that this would not impair the carrying of the fast mail by the train which is now employed in that service. Since that time several members of the committee have called upon me and stated that they had heard from the Santa Fe line, and that they would not carry the mail, running a special train as they do now, unless the compensation for fast service was left as it was. Therefore, at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] and upon the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], I concluded to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Before that is done, I think the amendment had better be passed over, because I talked yesterday with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who is very familiar with this matter, and he told me that it was very desirable to put these words in.

Mr. MASON. The amendment may go over for the present.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be better to let it go over for the present. I should like to wait until the Senator from Missouri is here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 13, before the word "expenses," to insert "compensation and;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation and expenses of United States delegates to the Universal Postal Congress to convene at Rome, Italy, not to exceed $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 69, line 18, after the word "stamps," to insert "and books of stamps;" so as to make the clause read:

For manufacture of adhesive postage and special-delivery stamps and books of stamps, $376,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 13, after the word "That," to insert "hereafter;" so as to make the clause read:

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of pieces of first-class registered matter, $12,000: Provided, That hereafter the Postmaster-General may increase the amount of indemnity provided for in act of February 27, 1897, an act amendatory of section 3926 of the Revised Statutes, to not exceeding $100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, after line 23, to insert:

For the employment of special counsel to be appointed by the Attorney-General, and at compensation to be fixed by the Attorney-General not exceeding this temporary appropriation, to prosecute and defend, on behalf of the Post-Office Department, all suits now pending or which may hereafter arise affecting the second-class mailing privilege, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 6, after the word "items" to insert "including necessary traveling expenses for the Third Assistant Postmaster-General within the District of Columbia;" so as to make the clause read:

For miscellaneous items, including necessary traveling expenses for the Third Assistant Postmaster-General within the District of Columbia, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General," at the top of page 75, to strike out section 5 in the following words:

SEC. 5. That hereafter, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails, it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails quantities of not less than 2,000 identical pieces of third or fourth class matter without postage stamps affixed: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 75, after line 7, to strike out section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. Whoever by violence enters a railway post-office car or any apartment in any railway car assigned to the use of the Railway Mail Service, or who willfully or maliciously assaults a railway postal clerk in the discharge of his duties in connection with such car or apartment, and whoever willfully aids or assists therein, shall for every such offense be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than three years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 75, after line 15, to insert:

That so much of section 1 of the act entitled "An act for the suppression of train robbery," approved July 1, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That if any person shall willfully and maliciously arrest the passage or enter upon any railroad train, railroad car, or railroad locomotive carrying the mails within the United States, with the intent to interfere with or rob the mails on said train, or who in pursuance of such intent attempts to commit murder, robbery, or any unlawful violence upon or against any passenger on said train or car or upon or against any engineer, conductor, fireman, brakeman, or any officer or employee connected with said locomotive, train, or car, or upon or against any mail agent or express messenger on said train, or in any such car thereof, or who in pursuance of such intent attempts to commit any crime or offense against any person or property thereon, such person shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding twenty years, or by fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court."

Mr. LODGE. That is a section, and it ought to be numbered, I think. The committee struck out section 5 and section 6, and the amendment just read by the Secretary ought to be numbered section 5 and the succeeding sections numbered to correspond.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done by the clerks.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to offer a mere verbal amendment to the amendment. In line 20, on page 75, I move to strike out the word "if," after the word "That," and to insert "who" after "person."

Mr. MASON. It would then read how?

Mr. SIMMONS. "That any person who shall willfully," etc.

Mr. MASON. That is right.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, on page 77, after line 8, to insert as a new secton the following:

SEC. 9. That third and fourth class mail matter shall not be remailed to sender until the proper postage has been fully prepaid on the same: Provided, That in all cases when undelivered mail matter of the third and fourth class is of obvious value, the sender, if known, shall be given the opportunity of prepaying the return postage or accepting delivery to himself or upon his order, at the office where it is held, upon the payment of 1 cent postage for each card notice given him, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill has been concluded, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. After line 19, on page 61, I move to insert:

For experimental rural telephone free delivery, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, $25,000.

Mr. LODGE. That seems to me to open up a large and entirely new question. We have heard nothing in the committee in regard to it from the Department, and I should like to know something about the amendment before it is voted upon.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, the proposed amendment does open up a large and important question. It is perhaps true that the committee has received no information from the Department upon the subject. I do not know that it is necessary that it should receive consideration from the Department before it receives consideration here.

The proposition is a very plain one. It can be easily understood. We are all familiar with the rural free-delivery service as it has expanded during the past six or seven years. There is no branch of the service that is so acceptable to all the great farming communities of the country as that service which daily brings the United States mail to the doors of the farmers.

There was a great deal of opposition to that service in its infancy. I recollect that within six years past Senators rose upon this floor and protested against rural free delivery, believing that it was but the beginning of a raid upon the Treasury of the United States.

It was asserted from time to time, Mr. President, that the service was impracticable, that it was impossible, but I believe it is the common judgment of all in both Houses of Congress and throughout the country that the service is a practicable service and an indispensable service.

In many sections of the country the telephone system radiates and ramifies everywhere. In some sections of the West there is scarcely a farmer who has not a telephone in his own home, and those who do not have it expect to have it in the not distant future.

I venture the prediction, Mr. President, that it will only be a comparatively short time when substantially all the farmers and all the rural neighborhoods will have a complete telephone system.

The proposition I make is simply this: The Postmaster-General——

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Has this amendment received the sanction of any committee of this body?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Whether it has or not I do not know. It was offered in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. LODGE. It has not been considered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, so far as I am aware.

Mr. PETTUS. I understand the Senator to say that he does not know that it has received the sanction of any committee?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not know that it has received consideration at the hands of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I know that it was introduced and referred to that committee in the ordinary manner.

Now, Mr. President, if the service which is so satisfactory to the great agricultural communities of the country can be extended or supplemented by the delivery of important and urgent mail through the instrumentality of the telephone we will have rendered a far-reaching and important service. It seems to me that whatever reasonably can be done here to make home life upon the farm more attractive and delightful should be done in all fairness.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator if his amendment is printed?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The amendment is printed. It is a brief amendment, I will say to the Senator from Kansas. It recognizes that the subject is a new one. It proposes to deal with it as was done in the case of the rural free-delivery service. It puts into the hands of the Postmaster-General a small sum—the sum of $25,000—with which to make experiments. Whether the experiments will be successful or not, it is too early to predict. They may or may not be successful. The sole question is, should the experiment be made?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. With great pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was not in the Chamber when the amendment was read, and I just caught this phrase from the Senator, delivery of mail matter by telephone. I did not quite comprehend it. Will the Senator briefly explain what he means? Is it that the postmaster shall telephone to the patrons that there is mail in the office awaiting their call?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No; the general idea is this: If a letter is sent, we will say, to a county seat, intended for transmission to a farmer in the country, bearing a stamp denoting its character, the postmaster is authorized and required to open it and telephone its contents to its destination.

Mr. GALLINGER. To telephone the contents?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just as they do telegraphic messages.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Just as they do telegraphic messages. It is a very simple process, and it seems to me that it is worthy the careful consideration of the Department.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me? Is it to be telephoned over a Government telephone or over a private telephone?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is a matter of detail, if the Senator pleases, and must be left to the discretion of the Postmaster-General; it is not to be dealt with now.

Mr. BURTON. The experiment?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The experiment. It is not to be telephoned over a Government telephone. The Government, as the honorable Senator is of course aware, has none; and it is not in contemplation that it will have one.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not know but that it might be contemplated that the Government should have telephones.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No; not at all.

Mr. LODGE. The language of the amendment is "telephone free delivery."

Mr. SPOONER. Does that mean that the telephone company must carry the message for nothing?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It means that the Postmaster-General may arrange in a given community with the local telephone company, as he may now arrange with a railway for the carrying of mails. In many sections of the West, as the Senator is advised, the farmers have their own neighborhood telephones, where there would be no charge whatever for telephoning letters of special importance and bearing appropriate and necessary stamps. The amendment contemplates that the Postmaster-General shall investigate the entire subject, and that he may arrange with the local telephone company, if in his judgment it is reasonably possible to do so, for the transmission of special letters by telephone upon the payment by the Government of a reasonable rate.

Mr. SPOONER. That means at the cost of the Government?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. At the cost of the Government.

Mr. SPOONER. Somebody has to pay for those messages.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. In some places there would be no special charge for this telephone service. It would be practically free.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. In such cases there would be no cost to the Government, and if this system should be adopted, I take it there would be free rural telephonic service in a great many neighborhoods of the country. It is all an experiment.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not antagonizing the proposition. I am only endeavoring to elicit information.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I understand the Senator is not antagonizing the proposition.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that there would be a stamp required for such messages, as in the case of the sending of a letter?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes; there would be an additional charge to cover the cost of the service.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to remark that, unless there is some revenue from some source, this would be a pure bonus.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. No; there will be an additional charge, as in the case of special-delivery letters, where a 10-cent stamp is required. A stamp should be used to cover the increased expense incurred by the Government in making quick special delivery. It seems to me the experiment is worth making.

The evolution of the postal system of the United States, which has reached a remarkable degree of efficiency, has been toward speedy delivery in both city and country. Can not the efficiency of the service be still further improved? There are those who think it can be. If the Postmaster-General is authorized to make the experiment and finds that it is impracticable, that is the end of the matter.

If he shall find that it is feasible and desirable to expedite communication with agricultural communities, in special cases, through the use of one of the greatest of modern developments, the telephone, Congress can then determine how far it will go in the extension of the service. Is it not well to clothe the Postmaster-General with power to make the experiment? It need not be made a burden upon the Government. The service, if feasible and desirable, should be put upon a self-supporting basis.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I have before stated, this subject is new to the members of the committee. They have had no information about it from the Department. The Senator from Indiana does not appear to think that of importance, but the committee is rather apt to look to the Department for information relating to new propositions.

Now, the rural free-delivery service is, as we may say, just beginning. That is a normal extension of the methods of post-office deliveries; that service is yet in its infancy, and yet the appropriation for it in this bill is $12,000,000, which is an increase of $5,000,000 over last year. It is going on; undoubtedly it is a success; but it is going to involve very large expenditures, indeed. It seems to me that it is the part of wisdom and of intelligent legislation not to add an entirely new experiment to rural free delivery until the rural free delivery itself is thoroughly established, its expense known, and some idea gained of how far it is going and what we can best do with it.

This amendment, which is so simple and involves only an expenditure of $25,000, opens up a very large question of free telephone service.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. May I interrupt the honorable Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the experiment should prove to be entirely feasible, would the Senator object to its favorable consideration because it opened up a large field?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think we had better perfect the rural free-delivery service before we enter on further experiments. That is a great system and is going to be an exceedingly expensive one. I have no doubt that it will pay for every dollar that is expended in it by the great benefit derived from it. But with that system just at its beginning, it seems to me unwise to enter on a fresh experiment, which will involve, in my judgment, sooner or later, the taking over the telephone service. That I regard as a very large and a very doubtful question; and I certainly, as a member of the committee, am not prepared to vote upon that question without one particle of information from people who know about it, and with nothing more than this perfectly general amendment, not defining the experiment.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator says the proposed amendment has not had consideration by the Department or by the committee. That is not the fault of the mover of the amendment. The amendment was introduced on Thursday, the 19th instant, and if the amendment did not receive the attention of the Post-Office Committee it was certainly not the fault of the mover of it.

Mr. LODGE. I think it was the fault of the mover of the amendment, because the bill was reported to the Senate on the 18th instant.

Mr. MASON. The bill was reported before the amendment was offered.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I was not aware of that fact. It had not come to my attention.

Mr. LODGE. The committee had no chance whatever to examine the amendment. I never heard of it until it was presented on the floor.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It is a very brief amendment, and it explains itself. It needs no interpreter.

Mr. PROCTOR. This proposition seems to me to be paternalism run mad. These telephone companies are corporations like express companies, and if their messages are to be delivered by the Government, why should we not deliver express packages? The next proposition probably will be to deliver goods from the department stores.

This is a matter, as has been said, which has received no consideration by the committee. It is entirely new matter, and it seems to me a very gross departure from wise legislation.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I agree fully with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the free rural delivery system has not yet been perfected. We appropriate in this bill $12,000,000 to carry on the work; it will take three years at least to complete it, and it will cost $24,000,000 per year. We have not a single word from the Post-Office Department in favor of this new legislation, and not only that, but we have had no information furnished to the committee. To begin this new legislation at this time, Mr. President, which will probably consume in the future millions of dollars, without any information being given to us, would, in my judgment, be a mistake. There has not been a word submitted to the committee in favor of the amendment; there is not a word to be found in the report of the Postmaster-General in favor of it, and, in my opinion, the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. PETTUS. I suggest, Mr. President, that this amendment is out of order, on the ground that it is new legislation proposed to an appropriation bill and that it has never been estimated for by the head of any department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order that the amendment has not been estimated for by the head of a department or reported by any standing or select committee of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I send to the desk an amendment which I offer as an additional paragraph to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new paragraph the following:

For investigation and report by the Postmaster-General on the feasibility of the use of the telegraph as a means of carrying the mails, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order on that amendment that it has not been estimated for by the head of any department or reported by a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has it been estimated for or reported from any committee of the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. MASON. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and to the Senate that what is proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] is what is known as the post-parcels amendment. It was considered by the committee and adversely reported upon as new legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new paragraph the following:

To authorize and enable the Postmaster-General to put into operation an experimental parcels-post service between Washington and Richmond, or Washington and Philadelphia, or between Washington and all of the above-named places, or between any other points he may deem most practicable; and to establish rules and regulations for the carrying of parcels by the Post-Office Department, not to exceed 11 pounds in weight, and to charge for the same not to exceed 6 cents for 1 pound and 2 cents additional for each extra pound up to and including 11 pounds: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may add an additional charge, not to exceed one-half of the above charges, for the immediate delivery of such packages to the addressee. The sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation and not properly before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It has not been estimated for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is clearly subject to the point of order, as it has not been estimated for by the head of any department or reported by any committee of the Senate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is what I had in mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to be added as a new clause to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

Public documents printed by order of Congress for distribution by Members or Delegates to Congress shall be registered without charge when requested by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I hope that no point of order will be made against that amendment. I only speak for myself, but I think it is a very important and a very wise amendment. However, I did not mean to take the Senator from Texas off the floor, but only to state my views regarding the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I am entirely willing to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas a question. Do I understand that that amendment is designed to give the right of free registry to public documents?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; to public documents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment on page 68 was passed over at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. I should like the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to be present when that amendment is considered.

Mr. MASON. This matter will have to go over until to-morrow anyway. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is about to take the floor. I have just two formal amendments which I wish to offer now, if I may be permitted to do so. I want to clean up the amendments, if I can, with one exception. I have here two short amendments involving the expenditure of only $58.60, which ought to be adopted and which have been recommended. They were on the bill last year and went out in conference. One is for only $9 and the other is for $49.60.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are they committee amendments?

Mr. MASON. No, Mr. President. These provisions were offered last year as committee amendments, but I forgot to call the attention of the committee to them this year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the proper place in the bill the following:

For the payment to James Graham for carrying daily mail from Altamont to Aspen, on the old line of the Union Pacific Railroad, $49.60.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to rise to something at some time or other. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that he allow us to dispose of these small amendments to the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want an explanation of them.

Mr. LODGE. They are amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I have stated that these amendments were on the bill last year on the recommendation of the Department. One is for a lost money order and the other is for carrying the mail. They went out of the bill last year in conference.

I will say, Mr. President, that I have no desire to go on now if the Senator from South Carolina wishes to take the floor, but I wish to give notice that there are other amendments which I intend to ask the Senate to consider. One is the amendment—and I wish the Senate to be advised of that matter—which has been up before, providing that the same rate of postage shall apply to all periodicals which now applies to weekly periodicals. The Postmaster-General admits the correctness of the amendment. We have been petitioned by hundreds of thousands of readers of these different publications to so amend the bill. It is not, strictly speaking, new legislation, and I should like to have a vote of the Senate upon it.

All the papers in the United States known as journal papers advocate the adoption of the amendment for the reason that the present law is an absolute absurdity. The weekly paper receives the benefit of pound rates, but the monthly paper does not receive that benefit. It was only by a tie vote that the amendment was defeated in committee. I want a vote in the Senate upon that amendment.

I also wish a vote in the Senate upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], which provides for free delivery in cities of 5,000 inhabitants when the Postmaster-General shall so direct.

I also wished a vote on the amendment which I intended to offer fixing the rate of pay of clerks in first-class post-offices, but I have been notified that a point of order will be made against such an amendment, and therefore I have decided not to offer it at this time.

With these exceptions, I think there are no other amendments I intend to offer. I know, of course, that the statehood amendment has gone over, subject to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand that the two small amendments sent to the desk by the Senator from Illinois have been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; they have not been agreed to. Only one of the amendments has been read. The question is on the adoption of that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I now offer the other amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator that we dispose of the other amendment which we passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is only one more amendment.

Mr. LODGE. That is the Fort Scott amendment, and I suggest that that be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment which was passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 68 in line 2, after the word "Newton," the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reported an amendment, to insert the words "and Fort Scott;" so as to read:

For continuing necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton and Fort Scott, Kans., $25 000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I now ask that the amendment I sent to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new paragraph the following:

For the payment of post-office order No. 11106, issued at Lander, Wyo., drawn upon the post-office at Evanston, Wyo., August 13, 1899, and which has never been paid, and which, under ruling of the Comptroller, can not be paid through the Post-Office Department, $9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator now desires the bill to go over.

Mr. MASON. I desire the bill to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, it goes back to the Calendar.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I desire to ask if the two amendments of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] have been agreed to. There was one, I think, in regard to second-class matter.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. CLAY. That was not agreed to?

Mr. LODGE. None of them have yet been offered, as I understand.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Illinois offered the amendment, as I understood, just a minute ago.

Mr. LODGE. No; I understand he has not.

Mr. MASON. I have tried to make it plain that I have offered so far no amendments on my own account. The amendments thus far adopted are committee amendments; but I have reserved the right to-morrow to offer these amendments on my own account and to ask for a vote of the Senate on them.

Mr. LODGE. Those that the Senator has just stated?

Mr. MASON. Those I have just stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes to the Calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to know how the bill got to the Calendar when I was on the floor trying to address the Chair, and only yielded because of the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON] asked that the bill go over until to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not hear him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He made the request.

Mr. TILLMAN. I heard the Chair state the request, but there was no request from that Senator so far as I heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asked that the bill go over until to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to dispute the Chair's word, but if it goes over, then what comes up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from South Carolina was coming up on his feet. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Can I speak by unanimous consent, I should be pleased to have the Chair tell me, or can I speak on whatever I please?

Mr. MASON. I will withdraw——

Mr. TILLMAN. I have a right to speak on this subject, and I want to talk on this bill.

Mr. MASON. I will withdraw my request to have the bill go over. It may be considered pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am much obliged to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TILLMAN. For what purpose?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I wish to ask a question. I inquire what matter is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Has that bill not been laid aside?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been. It is now before the Senate, and the Senator from South Carolina proposes to address the Senate in relation to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, on the 24th of January the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in a very calm and dispassionate and very earnest and eloquent speech presented some views in regard to the Indianola post-office matter. I wanted to get in and have some little colloquy or debate with my friend that afternoon, but we had a special order for pensions, which came on at 5 o'clock; and the Senator left the city that night; and I was unwilling while he was away to speak on the subject, which would be largely to controvert the position he had taken; so I deferred my remarks until his return.

When he got back, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], who is interested in this matter, had a call to go home, and requested me to wait till his return, and since they both got back into the Senate Chamber we have been in a deadlock over the statehood bill, the Panama Canal treaty, and other matters, with two engines facing each other on the same track, and no siding here or somewhere else for them to go into, or the engineers unwilling to back off, so that I have had my speech ripening and, I hope, mellowing for nearly a month. I propose on this occasion to surprise my friends and to astonish and disappoint my enemies, if I have any in this body, by being very mild and temperate.

This subject is one which appeals very deeply to me and very deeply to many millions of American people—I will say to all of them—because, while they view it from different standpoints, I feel willing to say that in both ends of this great country the vast majority—I might well say all of our people—want to settle the status and the future of the African, or the negro, upon broad, patriotic, and humanitarian grounds.

I should not presume to discuss the Indianola post-office matter if it were not a striking illustration of a condition. We have been dealing with theories in the South and at the North in regard to the race question for many, many years, even before I was born, but we are now face to face with conditions which call forth, or should call forth, the highest patriotism and the best statesmanship that this country can afford.

The Indianola post-office is, you might say, the match which has touched off an electrical line of thought reaching to the remotest bounds of this country. From my standpoint, it involves the most complex, the most difficult, the most dangerous of all the questions which confront this Republic. If it was merely a local issue, dealing only with the status of that little village and its mail facilities, I would leave it where the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] has left it.

At this time the condition there is not at all acute, and there may be no real reason why the subject should be discussed; but when you recall the fact that the action of the National Government in regard to this office was taken calmly and advisedly, without any passion, so far as I know, but in pursuance of a fixed policy; when the President felt called on to make an announcement, through his private secretary, as to what motives controlled and influenced his action; when, following on the heels of that, we had introduced here by a distinguished Republican Senator, the chairman of the national Republican committee, a bill dealing with the race question, providing for pensions for the ex-slaves; when the Secretary of War in his speech in New York deemed it necessary to make public his view as to the situation—and I shall not repeat what he said, because all of you read it—when a distinguished prelate of the Catholic Church, Archbishop Ireland, in a similar address in Chicago, I believe it was, felt it to be his duty to announce certain ideas and purposes or sentiments; when I know by personal experience throughout the North, from one end of it to the other, in colleges and high schools the question is being discussed and debated by the younger generation—I say this for the reason that I have had in the last twelve months at least a hundred letters from school boys and college boys in the Northern States calling on me to give them some information or furnish them documents or speeches relating to it—when throughout the South at this time, as I well know, the feelings of that people are aroused and the agitation in the minds of the Southern people is more general and universal in regard to this one question than any other, I think it is time that some man here who does know something about the subject and who has given it some study and thought should give the country the benefit of some plain, straightforward, honest, patriotic, manly utterances. If I am claiming too much as to what my purpose is, then I can only say that I shall fail of my intention if my language and my speaking on this subject does not rise to that attitude and command such praise.

If we had known, fellow-countrymen, before the civil war as much about each other as we know now, there would have been no war. A distinguished Southern bishop has declared that the Northern and Southern people have been very unfortunate in discovering all that was bad about each other, and have been woefully lacking in success in discovering what was good about each other, or a great deal that was good about each other. Therefore, as it is a condition and not a theory which confronts us, I say again it behooves the best thought and best statesmanship of this country calmly and deliberately to face this problem and set about doing something that will alleviate and ameliorate the condition and prevent a conflagration in the future either of a war of races in the South, black against white, or something involving a national warfare or like catastrophe.

Before I enter upon a discussion of the race question proper, as a general philosophical topic affecting our common country, I want to deal specifically with the Indianola post-office matter, because, as I have said, it is a button which has touched an electric wire that is tingling all over this country.

In order to refresh the minds of Senators as to the genesis or origin of what is known as the Indianola post-office case, I will read an extract from the announcement or letter, or whatever it may be termed, which was sent out from the White House by Mr. Cortelyou, the President's private secretary.

The postmaster recently forwarded her resignation, to take effect on January 1, but the report of inspectors and information received from various reputable white citizens of the town and neighborhood show that the resignation was forced by a brutal and lawless element, purely upon the ground of her color, and was obtained under terror of threats of physical violence.

The mayor of the town and the sheriff of the county both told the post-office inspector that if she refused to resign they could not be answerable for her safety.

Jumping a little, Mr. Cortelyou says:

In the view of the President the relief of the business interests, which are being injured solely by the action of the lawless element of the town, is wholly secondary to the preservation of law and order and the assertion of the fundamental principle that this Government will not connive at or tolerate wrong and outrage of such flagrant character.

Here we have the point of view of our Chief Executive and his justification of his action.

Now I come, in order to open this case fairly and with absolute impartiality, to the statement made in the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. Taking the view of the inspector that a "brutal and lawless element" in Indianola had by threats of violence forced the postmaster to resign, the Senator from Wisconsin, with the evidence before him—he was obliged to admit it, and he did it very gladly and cheerfully—said:

But it would be a rare thing, I think, North or South, to find a community of fifteen hundred or two thousand people in which there is not a lawless and brutal element.

The President was informed by the papers that a majority of the people of Indianola are such as the Senator describes them to be—

Alluding to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]— and that they were opposed to the proceedings which forced—I say forced—the resignation of this postmistress.

Repeating it, as though to emphasize it, the Senator from Wisconsin said:

I said there is the highest possible authority in the papers which were before the President, establishing the fact, which could not be gainsaid, that the large majority of the people of that community are such as the Senator described—peaceable and law-abiding people, who deprecate the action of the minority which forced this resignation, but who did not prevent it.

Mr. President, the first thing which occurs to me here is to ask—I want Senators calmly to consider the justice of the proposition—why it was that in the action taken by the Executive the large majority of the good, peaceable, law-abiding citizens are punished because there are, in his estimation, a "lawless and brutal element," small in number, who had taken the action which necessitated the resignation of the postmaster? Why, in any community in this country where law and order are the rule, and if they are not the rule can be made the rule, shall the innocent be punished because there are some who are guilty? Is that not contrary to the fundamental principle of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, wherein it is declared that it is better that one hundred guilty shall escape than that one innocent shall suffer?

The Senator from Wisconsin, in his strong and eloquent plea for the end at which he was aiming, goes on to argue the case out, and he uses this language:

She had as much right under the Constitution and laws of the United States—a Federal instrumentality, discharging Federal functions within the limits of a State—to hold her office without duress, without obstruction, moral or physical, as we have, anyone of us, to sit in this Chamber and to discharge here without intimidation of any kind our duties.

Then, in order to bring out the point he was endeavoring to use as a lever or reason for the conclusion at which he arrived, he declared that it was duress, that there was force, moral or otherwise, and that the threats of force were of such cogency and power that this woman, dreading the result, tendered her resignation, and that therefore she was forced to resign. He speaks of it in this way:

If it was not duress, what was it? It was the power of the community originating in this meeting, represented by petition, circulated in an organized way to bring pressure, for it constituted pressure, upon this agent of the Federal Government to quit her post of duty, not when she chose, not when the Federal Government chose, not when the President chose, but when this mass meeting chose.

The Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Mississippi had some disagreement about the mass meeting. I do not pretend to determine which of them has the better part of the law in this matter. I suppose our Constitution guarantees the right of the people to assemble peaceably and petition for redress of grievances. The question might arise, and I have no doubt it would arise in the mind of a lawyer, whether that meant a petition to somebody who was local or to a central authority, the President or the Congress, or to some one having power to redress grievances. I will leave out that question. I do not pretend to discuss the question as to the legitimacy or the illegitimacy, the wrong or the right of the petition which was not sent to the postmaster, but which was being prepared to be sent to her, asking for her resignation.

The Senator from Wisconsin, going on to deal with this question from the one standpoint of national authority, says:

This is vital, and if the Government is not dependent upon the consent of States to the exercise of governmental functions, how much less is it dependent upon the consent of the people of towns, villages, and cities?

Is it to be admitted for a moment or permitted for a moment that the people of a village or city may close a post-office established and officered under the Constitution and laws of the United States by forcing the agent of the Government to quit because they do not like that agent? Is the conduct of a post-office by the General Government to be made to depend upon the approval by the patrons of the agent chosen by the Government?

If it will do the Senator any good, I will say it here and now, of course not. It is not in the dream of the wildest ass with a white skin on who roams over the Southern States that the Federal Government is not supreme throughout these United States. But there are some fundamental principles involved in connection with the power, with the authority of the United States, to which I shall direct your attention.

If the doctrine is true that we are no longer a confederacy but a nation, whose authority, central and emanating from the Executive and Congress, is supreme—I do not deny it and nobody down my way does deny it—I want to ask you if there are not some cognate propositions going along with that doctrine which have been ignored in this case?

I read here some words used by our forefathers when they met in convention to frame a Constitution for the government of the colonies or the States. I read from the preamble:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Those are the objects sought to be attained, and I want to say here and now that when those objects are ignored in maintaining the authority of the National Government and asserting its right to have its agents respected and peaceably allowed to perform their functions, we are face to face again with a condition and not a theory.

While it may be vital and is vital to the maintenance of the national authority and the respect for the flag and for the Government that its agents, appointed in due course of law and according to the Constitution, shall be protected, if necessary, by the Army, I want to ask you whether you are ready to maintain the proposition that a post-office is ordained and created merely for the officer and not for the people who patronize it and who cause it to exist. Would there have been any post-office at Indianola if there had not been mail directed to the citizens of that community?

Would not the post-office cease to exist if by some cataclysm of nature the citizens of that community who have been receiving mail there should all die or be swept away? But with the people there, the postage being collected on whatever mail they may receive, the facilities which the Government provides under law for every citizen similarly situated have been denied to the people of Indianola. The office is closed, the postmaster is gone, and the innocent people, who had a right to expect the Government to protect them in the inalienable right of receiving the mail where they paid for it with the postage stamp at their doors and where a post-office had existed, find that right has been annulled and abrogated and that "justice," the "general welfare," and the "blessings of liberty" have disappeared.

I maintain, gentlemen, that any policy, from whatever motive, which ignores the rights of the people, and which forgets that the Government was created for the people and not the people for the Government, is wrong. It is fundamentally wrong. And yet we have the boldest possible illustration of such a thought or feeling or purpose in the Executive when, merely because there are in a community some brutal and lawless men, the rights of the people of that community who are innocent, who have done nothing, to be regarded and treated as other citizens of other counties and cities and States are treated are ignored.

My friend the Senator from Wisconsin says the office is not abolished—he got it somewhere; I do not know; I have not taken the trouble to look it up; he is always so accurate that I think he knows what he is talking about—that we can not abolish a post-office in a county town or court-house. I want him or anyone else to tell me what the meaning of abolishment is. There is no mail going there. All the mail directed to Indianola was ordered to be sent to Greenville, 30 miles away. As was proper, and as I would suppose right, a petition was presented to have the mail sent to the nearest town, Heathman, 4 miles off. But, no; it was ordered sent to Greenville, 30 miles away.

I suppose the name of the postmaster of Indianola is on the roll of the Post-Office Department; that she is drawing her salary, $100 a month or more, because it is a Presidential office. If the office is not abolished, I want somebody to explain what condition it is in. Of course I suppose the name remains on the post-route map. The town is on the railroad, and it can not be rubbed off the United States map; and we are face to face with this condition: That community has had a burden placed on it—these good people, these peaceable people, these law-abiding people; three-fourths of them or four-fifths of them or nine-tenths of them—of the additional expense of having to send to Heathman because of malice, if there was malice. I do not want to charge malice.

But whatever motive caused the Department to refuse to have the mail for Indianola changed to Heathman, it could not be carried out, for how could you prevent the people of Indianola from directing their newspapers to be sent to Heathman and instructing all their correspondents to mail their letters to Heathman? And unless that office is to be abolished, too, this miserable scheme of punishment has been circumvented by the simple action of the Indianola people getting their mail at the nearest point by having it directed to that office.

Was there any cruelty in this? Yes. And who are the sufferers? What is the situation to-day? As usual, whenever any attempt is made by those abroad, who know nothing much of the South, and who deal with it only from a political standpoint, to intermeddle in our affairs, the poor negroes are the greatest sufferers. All the white people of that community have met together and pooled their little money; whatever was necessary. They have hired a man to carry their mail to Heathman and bring it back twice a day.

They have created a little post-office of their own, personal and private, at which the mail thus brought, for white people only, mark you, by a white man for white people, is distributed by a white woman, who receives a salary for it, and while the negroes of Indianola, who are largely in the majority, get very little mail and possibly have not been seriously damaged, still what mail they do get has been ordered to Greenville, and they have to hunt up some means by which some one will either go 30 miles by the railroad or get some one to bring it back on the railroad and deliver it.

The office is closed, though not "abolished." There is a private postmistress or postmaster in the employ of the citizens. They are getting their mail; they are fairly well satisfied, I suppose; but do you not know that deep down in their hearts they feel that this thing could not happen in a Northern State? Do you not know it? Do you not?

The Senator from Wisconsin—seeming to desire above all things to let his brethren here, and the people of the South especially, and anyone else who is willing to study this question, as he has put it in his speech, know—made a statement which he repeated and repeated and repeated in varying forms; and I will do him the full justice of reading everything he had to say in regard to that one fundamental, monumental, Pikes Peak doctrine of national supremacy. He said:

> What was done? The President refused to have a Federal office, held by a competent person, vacated against her will and under duress by local pressure, and, as the people there had closed the office to all intents and purposes, he declined to accept the resignation; and in doing that, Mr. President, he acted upon a principle absolutely essential to the virility and strength of the National Government.
> It presented itself to him, as it will present itself to thoughtful men everywhere who are unbiased, as vital to the Government of the United States that it shall be permitted to transact the Government business, to protect the Government property, through such agencies in the States as the Government selects in the constitutional way, without consent or interference locally—and I will deal with that briefly in a moment. It is that principle, Mr. President, which underlies the action of the President and upon which I have justified his action, because, whatever else the Senator may think the President was misinformed about, he was not misinformed upon the proposition that this woman did not wish to resign; that she desired to serve out her term of office, and that she would have done that if she had been permitted.

Further on he said:

> May the choice of a postmaster or a marshal or district attorney be taken practically from the President and the Senate and made to depend upon the dictation of the people of a locality? And if one postmaster, chosen by the President and Senate, may be forced to quit and a successor appointed, why may not one successor after another be forced to resign until one satisfactory to the locality shall have been chosen?
>
> And then who, in fact, will have appointed the official?
>
> The Federal agent must be appointed by the constitutional methods, and obstructions in any way in the discharge of Federal functions by localities can not be permitted.

Going on, my eloquent friend said:

> Here is a post-office. Under the Constitution Congress establishes post-offices and post-roads. The sign of the sovereignty of the Federal Government in Indianola is the post-office. That is the one place, Mr. President, where the flag of the United States has a right to float as testimony that it is in possession of the United States and subject alone to its jurisdiction; and if the agencies of the United States are to be carried on or obstructed in a State at the wish, caprice, whim, or because of hatred or excitement of individuals or masses, what becomes of the Government as a government of power and a government of law? What becomes of the President sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed?

Right here I want to give my earnest support to this doctrine, but I want it carried out in its entirety and by lawful and not tyrannical methods.

I wish to quote to my friend a statute which is still on the statute book, placed there I do not know when, but I suppose during the reconstruction era, when this question was much more burning, though not half so dangerous as it is now. Section 5518 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that—

> If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire to prevent, by force, intimidation, or threat, any person from accepting or holding any office, trust, or place of confidence under the United States, or from discharging any duties thereof, or to induce by like means any officer of the United States to leave any State, district, or place where his duties as an officer are required to be performed, or to injure him in his person or property on account of his lawful discharge of the duties of his office, or while engaged in the lawful discharge thereof, or to injure his property so as to molest, interrupt, hinder, or impede him in the discharge of his official duties, each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

If you yourselves were to-day sitting here as a Committee of the Whole endeavoring to frame a statute to meet this abuse, if you term it such, this condition at Indianola, by which you should hedge it about with legal provisions and punishments, you could not change those words or strengthen them one iota. Yet, with that on the statute book; with the knowledge furnished by the inspectors and by witnesses by the hundred, almost, certainly as many as you want, that these people had met at the court-house; that they had organized; that they had come together, which is the essence of conspiracy; that they had set in motion machinery to cause an officer of the United States to quit the official position to which he or she had been assigned, when, if there is any criminality forbidden in that statute whatever, these men have been criminals, instead of putting the law in orderly motion and in accordance with the Constitution, which has been appealed to, the people are punished by extraordinary and outrageous devices.

The innocent are punished along with the guilty. The "lawless and brutal element" of which we have heard and which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] denied exists would be left to be determined in the future by any prosecution which might be brought under any indictment, with the witnesses to prove it. But here you had your remedy in a decent and proper and legal way and you did not use it.

The essence of good government is equality, that it shall touch all alike and treat all alike. When the lawmaking, or rather the law-executing, power endeavors to establish a rule which differentiates as between States and sections, which creates flesh of one and fowl of the other, you at once leave the safe path. Here was a law. The Army, if necessary, could have gone to the support of the postmaster if the civil machinery had not been sufficient to bring in an indictment and have these men who had conspired arrested. If you had not done anything more than simply attempted to punish them you would have accomplished your purpose. If you had failed of a verdict, if you had been unable to get a jury to convict, you would at least not have punished the innocent along with the guilty.

That is the gravamen of the indictment which we in the South bring. I said this action was taken calmly. This mass meeting was held in November. I will relate further to those who do not know the facts what the postmistress's husband or the postmaster's husband did. It is said that there is a legal word "postmaster," and that there is no such thing as a postmistress. I believe I will go back to the common-sense view and leave the legal alone, and speak about this woman as postmistress, because I get tangled in my own grammar when I do not.

When the husband of Mrs. Cox found that she was obnoxious to that community as postmistress, and that a mass meeting had been held, at which a petition was ordered to be gotten up and sent around the community asking citizens to sign it to request her to resign, he went to one of the men who was engaged in this matter and said, "My wife does not want this office if you people do not want her to have it. She is willing now, and she requests me to tell you, to give her resignation to the adjourned meeting," which was held a week later.

Then the question arose as to whether they should accept it or not, and of course they agreed to accept it. Now, my friend here grows very eloquent and very wrathy over the idea of a mass meeting accepting the resignation of a Federal appointee, and very justly from his point of view, because it was a very outrageous and insulting and insolent and rebellious action. But I suppose those people were after results rather than after the legal status. They were after obtaining relief from a negro postmaster or postmistress who had grown obnoxious not because of anything she herself had done, but for the reason that other things had happened in that community which had fanned the flame of race antagonism and made the people rush to do an unjust and improper thing. They acted thus because of an insulting, infamous proposition and insult from a negro man to a white woman, a poor Jewess who was clerking in the same store.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DEPEW in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I did not exactly catch the language of the Senator from South Carolina as to the people of Indianola doing an unjust and improper thing. As I caught it——

Mr. TILLMAN. I was only using the language of my friend from Wisconsin as to the legal phase. I myself do not think the people of Indianola transcended their rights to meet and to consider the best means of removing the obnoxious postmistress.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir; I merely wanted to say that the people of Indianola, as far as any evidence so far shows, have never done any illegal or improper or unjust act in reference to this post-office.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was simply using the thought and the language of the Senator from Wisconsin in order to trace the point he made, or tried to make, and which I am trying to show was on wrong law and wrong Executive action.

The Senator went on and asked, which it would be very natural for him to ask in Wisconsin, why the people of Indianola did not petition the President, the proper man to petition, the proper source of power, the appointing officer, the man whose duty it was to uphold the authority of the National Government, and who alone could take her away lawfully.

Why did they not petition him? Well, I do not want to rake over any embers. If there is any idea farther away from my heart and head than to get up a sectional debate, I do not know it. No good could come of that. I have not the remotest purpose or desire to drag into this discussion that old, miserable, horrible specter. I have been over the North possibly in the last four or five years more than any Southern man in this Chamber, and I have had occasion to take note of the fact as far as I could judge, and I gave every provocation to let it blaze up if it existed, because I was discussing the race question by request. I know that in the Northern States to-day there is very little left of that old hatred of the South which was so prevalent thirty years ago.

I realize that no man should approach this subject from any standpoint other than that of patriotic Americans who have to deal with the terrible conditions which it will take the best minds and the best hearts of this country to even ameliorate, much less to solve. I know that since the Spanish war, in which the Southern States sent their quotas of volunteers as promptly and as readily to be marshaled under the common flag, which they tried to shoot to pieces in 1861 to 1865, and were ready to do and die for the honor of the American people, the North has had little or no hatred for us. But they do not know what is involved in this issue. They can not understand it because they have not got anything like similar conditions, and therefore it is that I speak.

Petition the President! This leads me briefly to discuss the mode of Federal appointments in Southern States—the method pursued. I do not do it for the purpose of exciting any angry passions. I merely state facts which are familiar to all of you or which can be proven to be absolutely true if you doubt what I say.

Under the Constitution the appointment to every important office is made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Let me give a common-sense interpretation of those words. Just putting aside all political bias, and recollecting that we come here as the representatives, two from each State, on an equality without regard to population, wealth, or area, the only possible interpretation of that language is that it was supposed by the framers of the Constitution that the representatives of a given State would know more about the character and qualifications of any person in their respective States, and that their opinion and advice in regard to such individual would be followed by their brethren here from other States.

In many instances that is the only rule which obtains. Now, as far as the Northern people are concerned, you find here that the representatives from the Northern States have absolute control of most of the appointments in their Commonwealths, either in this Senate or in conjunction with the other. The exception is very rare in which the President takes it upon himself to go outside of or contrary to the will and the desire of both Senators and of all the Representatives from a Northern State.

How is it in my part of the country? Who controls the patronage? Who selects the officeholders? Who selects the representatives of the National Government, the men who are to uphold its honor and dignity and to perform its functions? Sometimes the rule varies, but as a general thing we find that to the chairman of the Republican State committee, in conjunction possibly with two or three other leaders, who may be made a board of reference, all appointments to office, however petty, are referred.

Now, in the North, where everybody, Democrats and Republicans, are on a level, where, if they have party differences, you do not know the difference as you walk along the street, where they do not know whether this store belongs to a Republican or a Democrat, or whether that man you meet is a Republican or a Democrat, and where there is personal friendship and business relations the most intimate between men of opposing parties, the question of the appointment to office submitted to the men in affiliation with the Executive in this Chamber and in the other can not bring any great wrong or bother.

The men selected will necessarily be, I suppose, in the condition of degraded politics to which we have reached, the partisan and earnest supporters of that party. It seems that has been the rule ever since somebody discovered away back yonder, seventy-five years ago, that "to the victors belong the spoils," and that therefore, those who were elected in the general election should have the right to turn out all the opposite party who held high official position. Of late years there has grown up a custom, not a law, allowing in many cases the holder of an official position to serve the term for which his commission is dated.

But in the South we have a condition which is simply a reminder to us perpetually of the fact that thirty-seven years ago our ancestors were conquered. We are reminded, forever and ever, that we are in the Union, but not of it—except to pay taxes.

These Republican boards of reference of which I have spoken are sometimes composed of one man, sometimes of half a dozen. They select all the postmasters for all the Presidential offices and many others. They select men for every other official position that is to be given out by the Republican party.

How many votes do they furnish you except in the national Republican convention? To that they go, and there is the poison in this situation.

Therefore these long, long years the balance of power in the Republican national conventions has been held by the representatives of the machine in the South, and the machine mainly is composed of negroes. These furnish the delegates who go to the national Republican convention; and it is a matter of common talk that when they get there and there is any trouble between Northern men involved in the mastery as to who shall be nominated the Southern representatives of the great Republican party thus chosen by a machine, kept alive by patronage, have always held the balance of power and have determined who shall get the honor and the chance to be elected President of this great country. And it is a notorious scandal that in some instances these delegates have sold their votes, and always they have obtained pledges of offices.

Now, this is a plain fact—a fact of current history. If the people of Indianola had petitioned the President of the United States to remove Mrs. Cox, the petition would have gone into the waste-basket, and everybody knows it. The petition to appoint Mrs. Cox had not come from them. No petition that they could have ever gotten up would have had any consideration at the hands of the Executive or the Postmaster-General.

So you see that this thing has another view, which some of you have not been able to see from your standpoint. Looking alone at the great plea of the necessity of maintaining the national authority and having its agents respected and allowed to remain in office, which no one disputes, you ignore the mode of appointment of those agencies, and you forget the fact that those 17,000,000 white men and women south of the Potomac and the Ohio are to-day, wherever Democracy is in power, ignored, and that the offices and all the evidences of the power of the Federal Government are parceled out by a small Republican machine, which can not and never will, in my judgment, as long as you continue the present policy, furnish you a solitary electoral vote.

We do not mind petitioning. I do not want to drag in or drag up any specters or ghosts, but I have filed petitions. I have filed protests. I have gone and plead and begged for justice when a negro from an adjoining county had been carried out of his county over into another county and made postmaster in a town where he did not live and knew nobody. Everything that I did was spurned, and the necessity of rewarding the men who would round-up delegates for the national Republican machine down there, who had pledged themselves to support somebody in the national convention, was far superior to any influence that I as a Senator from the State could exert. It ended in a bloody tragedy, but it has not wrought a change of policy.

Why should we continue to petition when our petitions are ignored and we are treated with contumely and contempt? We simply have shut our eyes and are going on. We are doing the best we can. We are face to face every day of our lives with this specter, this dread, this horrible nightmare; and when we lose patience sometimes, when we do cruel, bitter, fearful things, fiendish things, savage things, there is a howl from men who know nothing, who never have been south of the Potomac, and who have theorized and who have inherited their prejudices and sentiments.

I will elaborate a little further the point I have just made, or rather the statement of fact. It is not so much a point except in the intelligible discussion of the question. We in that part of the country are face to face, as they were in Indianola, for instance, with a three-to-one negro population, for Sunflower County has 18,000 negroes and only 6,000, or such a matter, of white people in it. We realize what it means to us to allow ever so little a trickle of race equality to break through the dam. When in our efforts, lawful or unlawful, constitutional or unconstitutional, to stem this tide of ignorant and debased and debauched men, we do things which we do not want to do, but which we feel it necessary to do, and which our instincts as white men make us do, we do not get any sympathy from those who know nothing about it. We can not take any risks, and we will not allow the idea to get any headway.

We are only told that these people have every right under the Constitution that we have and that it is our business to submit to the law. When we seek to have men of character, men of good reputation, men of integrity, of honesty, and of decency given public positions, we are ignored. We have only left to us the privilege of selecting between those who may be submitted to us by the Executive here, and if he makes a mistake—and he has got such poor material to choose from that very often he does make a mistake—then we are left with Hobson's choice; for we can not find any Republican who is properly fit to hold the position.

We of the South are under the dire alternative of letting these people be confirmed, or possibly do worse. That is our situation. If you, gentlemen, could just take this realizing sense home with you and put yourselves in our places for twenty-four hours, it would be all I or any other Southern man could ask of you.

Why was Mrs. Cox given this place? Was it because of any special superior fitness on her part? There is not any evidence of it. We will say, according to the reports, that she was absolutely competent; that her work was satisfactory so far as any colored woman could give satisfaction, and that there is nothing against her reputation in any shape, form, or fashion.

But we have had instances in my State in which local leaders—the precinct or county chairmen—being given the patronage of the local post-offices, have sold them to some man who wanted the job of holding a little $50 or $75 or $100 office; and there was no negro around that would dare to try to hold it in the backwoods—an office from the local Republican leader who was engaged in the business of helping this Republican State committee to round up the delegates to the State convention and help him control the delegation.

That is the situation, and our protests have fallen on deaf ears. We get no consideration. When we have undertaken to stop the appointment of a fourth-class postmaster the only redress has been to call for an inspector, to prefer charges, to try to bring the whole case up, and prove beyond peradventure that the man is a scoundrel or a thief or incompetent.

So you see there is another side to this question; that while in this case at Indianola Mrs. Cox or Mrs. Cox's supporters and friends may have just reason to say that an example should have been made; that Indianola should be deprived of its post-office; that the citizens should be put to as much trouble and bother as possible, and made to pay for it in inconvenience and money both, the question which addresses itself to us, and which we can not help—I do not mention this in any spirit of animosity or with any desire to arouse passion—the question which we naturally, necessarily, and inevitably ask ourselves is, Why it is that those who are responsible for this condition in the South and seem to desire to perpetuate and to continue it indefinitely do not once in a while try it among themselves?

There are 51,000 negro voters in Pennsylvania. When conditions are normal there and the Republican majority 50,000, they have the balance of power, and they are responsible for Republican control there. If you do not accept that State as an illustration, I might name others, where the negro vote is inevitably the controlling factor in maintaining the present party in power, and I might ask you why you do not recognize the negro in those States and give him some of these nice places.

Our mouths would be somewhat shut if you carried out in good faith among yourselves this policy of holding up forever the idea of negro equality, and if you would give some of them some of these places. Why not put one of them in the Cabinet? I would vote to confirm Booker Washington as secretary of anything. [Laughter.] There are 8,000,000 negroes, which is about one-ninth of the people of the country, and there are nine members of the Cabinet.

Why not have a genuine negro, not a mulatto or a hybrid, in the Cabinet? Then let us make them officers in the Army and the Navy; let us give them their pro rata share of all the good jobs wherever they exist, without regard to local conditions. You do not intend to do it; you could not do it; your people would not submit to it; and yet because you look South and see our situation there, with this large and in some States preponderating negro vote, you say we are obliged to recognize them; we are obliged to give them office.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CARMACK. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Connecticut to move an adjournment or a recess?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. An executive session.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to give a notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I wish at some time in the course of to-morrow to make a few observations in connection with the Indianola matter, not to defend the people there, because I think the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] has already done that, but to make some general observations growing out of that condition, and I shall, in the course of my remarks, have something to say with respect to the speech delivered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I see that he has been taking notes of the speech made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and if it is agreeable to him I will follow the Senator from South Carolina, and let the Senator from Wisconsin reply to both of us at the same time.

Mr. SPOONER. That is entirely agreeable to me. I want to make a very brief reply to the Senator from South Carolina, and I shall probably want to make a briefer reply to the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator can speak at his pleasure.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 24, 1903, at 12 o'clock meridian.

INJUNCTION OF SECRECY REMOVED.

The injunction of secrecy was removed on February 19, 1903, from the amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. MORGAN to the convention with Colombia for the construction of a ship canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, signed January 22, 1903.

The injunction of secrecy was removed on February 19, 1903, from a statement relating to the nominations of lieutenants in the United States Army pending before the Committee on Military Affairs, made under the act of Congress of February 2, 1901.

Data: Objections to confirmation, views of Secretary of War in favor of confirmation, and review of his statements.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 23, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Rev. JOHN WALLACE SUTER, of Winchester, Mass., offered the following prayer:

O God, who didst lead our fathers forth into a new land, and didst "set their feet in a large room," we remember them to-day with gratitude. We remember that they were not only valiant in war, but wise in council. We pray Thee that we, their children, may be worthy of them. Chiefly we remember this day set apart to his honor, him whose achievements are the model for our country's achievements, and, above all, whose character is a model for our own character; and we pray Thee that we, the children of such founders, may be continually worthy of them and worthy of Thee, our founder's God. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MARIE IRENE DONALDSON.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (S. 7223) providing for the interment of the remains of Marie Irene Donaldson and her daughter, Marie Irene Donaldson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the health officer of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a permit for the interment in the District of Columbia of the remains of the late Marie Irene Donaldson and her daughter, Marie Irene Donaldson, formerly residents of the District of Columbia and citizens of the United States, now interred at Puerto Plata, Santo Domingo.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EXEMPTING PROPERTY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I also call up the bill (S. 6515) "to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, District of Columbia."

The Clerk read the bill, as follows;

Be it enacted, etc., That the property situated in square No. 173, in Washington City, D. C., and occupied by the Daughters of the American Revolution, be, and the same is hereby, exempted from all taxation so long as the same is so occupied and used, subject to the provisions of section 8 of the act approved March 3, 1877, providing for exemptions of church and school property, and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement to the House. I suppose this bill will pass anyhow and in any event, but I want to go on record myself as opposing this continual exemption from taxation of property in the District of Columbia. I do not believe it is right, and especially it is not fair to the people of the District who are compelled to pay taxes that we should continually take away from the sum total of the taxable property here, as we are asked to do in this case. This is a lot bought by the Daughters of the American Revolution, on which they propose to build a house—erect some kind of a chapter house—a very proper matter and a very worthy proceeding on their part, but I do not believe for that reason that we ought to exempt it from taxation in this District, nor do I believe that we ought to exempt anything except church and public school property, and possibly property used solely for charitable purposes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This property is to be used wholly for patriotic purposes; it is not used for gain. The bill provides that when they shall cease to use it for that purpose it shall be subject to taxation.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman from Indiana is right; it is to be used for patriotic purposes and not for charity. Where are we going to draw the line between the various patriotic societies? The gentleman knows that there are hundreds of them in the United States, and they might all come here to the District of Columbia and desire to own property and erect a magnificent building. Are we going to exempt them all from taxation?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is not at all likely that they will go into the business of erecting memorial buildings here. These people have had a very hard time to raise the money to get this property. It does strike me, where they raise their own money instead of coming to Congress and getting an appropriation to erect this building, that the people of the District and the United States can afford to allow them to have the property exempt from taxation.

Mr. COWHERD. I put it on a matter of principle; I do not believe anything should be exempt from taxation except churches and public schools and strictly charitable institutions.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I believe this is regarded as a bill for the encouragement of genealogical societies.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman may possibly call it that. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COWHERD) there were 79 ayes and 39 noes.

So the bill was passed.

HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill 14050, to amend an act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the report and statement, which will be found in the proceedings of the House of February 9, 1903.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

UNION RAILROAD STATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, for the purpose of having it printed under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed under the rule.

The following is the conference report and the statement:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, and after full and free conference have been unable to reach an agreement.

J. W. BABCOCK,
SYDNEY E. MUDD,
A. C. LATIMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
W. P. DILLINGHAM,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The only amendments to the bill not disposed of are amendments numbered 39 and 41, decreasing the amount to be paid to the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad from $1,500,000, as proposed by the Senate, to $1,000,000, as proposed by the House, and also so much of amendment numbered 57 as relates to decreasing the amount to be paid to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from $1,500,000, as proposed in the legislation of February 12, 1901, to $1,000,000, as proposed by the House.

AUTOMATIC COUPLERS ON RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. As a privileged matter, the Chair lays before the House a Senate bill with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate, on which a conference is asked by that body.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 3560) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes."

Mr. WANGER. I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask whether it is in order first to vote on a motion that the House recede from its amendments and concur in the bill as passed by the Senate. Would not that motion, being a motion to bring the Houses nearer together, take priority over a motion to insist?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] moves that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks whether a motion to recede would take precedence. The Chair thinks that that motion is preferential in its character.

Mr. WANGER. I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama that nobody asks that the House recede from its amendments. There is a request that the House recede from a certain part of its amendments; but the bill as it passed the Senate is more objectionable, I understand, than any part of the amendments made by the House, most of which amendments were suggested by the very gentlemen who are now objecting to a certain part of the amendments to which I have referred.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman whether he will not assent to a proposition I am about to make. I know that a great many of these amendments are amendments upon which the House probably wants to insist; but there is one amendment which was put on this bill when it passed the House, when there was an expression of opinion by a large number of members of the House in opposition to that amendment; but as the bill passed the House under a suspension of the rules, we had to take it with the amendments included in the motion or not at all. The bill now goes to conference. Necessarily we must come ultimately to a vote on that amendment.

Now, I take it that the conferees on the part of the House, of whom I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] will be one, desire to meet the wishes of the Houses in reference to the amendment which I have in mind—the amendment authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the minimum number of cars that shall be required to carry this coupler. Now, before this matter goes to conference, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether, instead of voting at once on concurring or nonconcurring in the Senate amendments, he will not allow us a separate vote at this time on that particular amendment by way of instruction?

Mr. WANGER. I certainly can not do anything of that kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a motion at this time, before the conferees are appointed—if this is the time, and, if not, whenever the proper time shall arrive—to instruct the conferees to recede from the House amendment which allows the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the minimum.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] allow me a suggestion? My understanding of the amendment to which he refers is this: That, added to the provision of the bill, was an amendment by the committee which allows the Interstate Commerce Commission to decrease the maximum of 50 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand; but I will say to my colleague that I have been communicated with—this matter was before the Committee on Rules—I have been communicated with by practically every lodge of men who are engaged in the railroad business—I mean the men who couple the cars or who sit at the engines—and they are opposed to the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The confusion is so great that it is impossibe for us to hear this colloquy.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will suspend his remarks, and the House will come to order. The Chair will take this occasion to say that at the end of a session and the end of a Congress parties are so much interested in legislation that there is an unusual degree of activity on the floor, and gentlemen take the liberty of talking to each other in the Hall of the House just as if they were all undertaking to make speeches at the same time. It is impossible for the Chair to preserve order so that business can be intelligently transacted unless members of the House cooperate with the Chair for that end; and the Chair again admonishes all members that they must not converse in the Hall of the House. There are other places for conversational discussion. Therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and insists on members preserving order.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise for a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WANGER. What is the question before the House at this time?

The SPEAKER. There is no question before the House, except the motion that was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER]. The Chair did not hear one word that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] said, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was making a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair with a view to making a motion to instruct the conferees. Is the Chair correct?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is my desire.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then state to the gentleman that this is not the time to make a motion to instruct the conferees. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania must first be acted upon. If adopted, and after the conference is ordered, the House can then instruct its conferees.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition after the motion is adopted to move to instruct.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I rise for a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] who is in charge of this bill if it is not the fact that the amendment which has been complained of or objected to on the floor simply places the right within the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the minimum of 50 per cent, and if in connection with the——

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. WANGER. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. In connection with this amendment as to authority respecting the Interstate Commerce Commission, is it not true that the right does exist with the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase that minimum of 50 per cent?

Mr. WANGER. Certainly; that is a part of the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It has the right to decrease or increase the minimum, according to conditions?

Mr. WANGER. Certainly. I believe all persons ask that the Commission shall have power to increase. Some ask that it shall have the power to decrease, and others object.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WANGER. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Is not the sole effect of the amendment in question to place in the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission the dealing with exceptional cases?

Mr. WANGER. Yes; certainly.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which is to insist upon the amendments of the House and to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The question was taken, and the motion agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk let me know what is the number of the amendment under discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is amendment No. 2, but the Clerk will first report it, so that the gentleman and the House may act intelligently.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever, as provided in said act, any train is operated with power or train brakes, not less than 50 per cent of the cars in such train shall have their brakes used and operated by the engineer of the locomotive drawing such train; and all power-braked cars in such train which are associated together with said 50 per cent shall have their brakes so used and operated: Provided, That the Interstate Commerce Commission may, upon application and after full hearing, decrease said minimum percentage as to any common carrier, for a stated limited time: And provided, That in no case shall such reduction permit the running of any train with less power or train brakes than are required by section 1 of the act of March 2, 1893; and, to more fully carry into effect the objects of said act, the Interstate Commerce Commission may, from time to time, after full hearing, increase the minimum percentage of cars in any train required to be operated with power or train brakes which must have their brakes used and operated as aforesaid; and failure to comply with any such requirement of the said Interstate Commerce Commission shall be subject to the like penalty as failure to comply with any requirement of this section.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House instruct its conferees not to further insist on the amendment which has just been read by the Clerk, but to agree to the bill without that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make this inquiry of the gentleman. As the Chair understood from his previous remarks the only part of that amendment which he wishes to strike out is granting to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to fix the minimum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests in order to avoid a blunder that the gentleman reduce his motion to writing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Clerk to take it down and I shall state it. I move to instruct the conferees to recede from that portion of the amendment just read which seeks to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix the minimum number of cars that shall be handled.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WANGER. I read from Jefferson's Manual, page 206 of the Digest:

But the House can not recede from or insist on its own amendment with an amendment, for the same reason that it can not send to the other House an amendment to its own act after it has passed the act. They may modify an amendment from the other House by engrafting an amendment on it, because they have never assented to it; but they can not amend their own amendments, because they have on the question passed it in that form.

I submit that is precisely what the gentleman asks to have done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman overlooks the fact that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is not to recede from a part of it, but to instruct the conferees. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized for a moment or two.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To instruct the conferees to recede from that portion of amendment No. 2 which seeks to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix the number of cars to be handled.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] yield to the gentleman from Alabama, and how much time?

Mr. WANGER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I only want five or ten minutes in which to explain the effect of this motion. I do not care to argue it.

Mr. WANGER. I yield five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Say ten minutes,

Mr. WANGER. Ten minutes. I desire to suggest to the gentleman right now that the matter that was read by the Clerk does not reach the point in controversy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated the proposition to the Clerk. I will ask the Clerk to read my motion again.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the Clerk to read the amendment offered by him?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. UNDERWOOD moves to instruct the conferees to recede from that portion of amendment No. 2 which seeks to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to reduce the minimum number of cars to be handled.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That should be to fix the minimum number of cars to be handled.

The CLERK. To fix the minimum number of cars to be handled.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Clerk to make the correction in the amendment which I have just indicated.

Mr. MANN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do, but as I have only ten minutes I hope the gentleman will make it brief.

Mr. MANN. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he proposes by his instruction to leave it to the Interstate Commerce Commission to have the power of increasing the minimum, but not of decreasing the minimum?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to their increasing the minimum.

Mr. MANN. That is the effect of the gentleman's motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the effect of my motion. Some gentlemen objected to the motion as originally made, because they said it would take away the power to increase the minimum. I am willing to leave them the power to increase the minimum, but I want to take away from them the power to reduce it. My reason is this: Some years ago the House passed a bill by which it said that these safety-appliance brakes, air brakes, and other appliances should be put on the cars. The law required these railroads to equip every car with them. From year to year we extended their time to a reasonable limit. Now, I am informed that the statistics show that these roads have from 75 to 80 per cent of their cars equipped with them; but the trouble is that when they come to make up their trains, no matter how many cars they have equipped with the air brake, they only couple together the air-brake connections on a few cars in front of the train, and then when they have to stop the train suddenly the other cars behind, which are left uncoupled, come down on the front cars like a battering-ram, endangering the lives of the operators of the train.

Now, in the hearing before the Senate committee it appeared that there was only one railroad that insisted that it was not reasonable to couple up 50 per cent of these cars. As a matter of fact, I believe the Senate after having a full hearing reported this bill originally requiring the railroads to couple up 75 per cent of the cars, so that the air brake would be effective on 75 per cent of the cars in each train. But when it came to the House, after consideration, the House first reduced the number of cars on which the air brake was required to be effective to 50 per cent, and it was so reported by the House committee. Now, these various organizations of the men who operate these trains, the men whose lives are endangered in this matter, agreed to accept that, although the original law contemplated that every car should be coupled. But they said they would accept 50 per cent. Finally the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House carried this bill back into the committee and put on it an amendment by which the Interstate Commerce Commission can even reduce that 50 per cent.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just let me finish my statement, and then I will yield.

Mr. SHATTUC. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I say when the hearing shows only one railroad that said it was unreasonable to require 50 per cent of these cars to be coupled, and when every organization of the men who must ride on these cars in sleet and snow and bad weather and good weather comes here and earnestly asks that you stand by your bill as you originally reported it; that you should stand by the bill as the Senate committee agreed to it, or even less than the Senate committee agreed to; that you should stand by the bill as the great railroad corporations of this country themselves say is reasonable in the matter—they have come here, and so I say it is fair to instruct these conferees that when a train goes out at least 50 per cent of the cars shall be coupled. You are not asking them to put air brakes on or any unusual expenditure. That is required by law now. You simply say to them: Of the cars that are in that train with the air brakes hanging on the car already, uncoupled, you shall stop long enough to put these couplings together—not for the sake of money, not for the sake of commerce, but for the sake of human life. I say that is reasonable. Now, I will answer a question of my friend from Ohio.

Mr. SHATTUC. You say, if I understood you, that all the men of these train organizations have sent these letters and petitions to Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course my friend understands that I do not mean to say every individual has done so. But we have had the question of the consideration of this bill for some weeks before the Committee on Rules, and from Maine to California, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and from all the States in the Union we have been receiving letters from the organizations of these trainmen, and their petitions are petitioning that their lives and the safety of the living of their families may not be endangered by allowing this practice to continue.

Mr. SHATTUC. I thought you said you were going to yield to me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was replying to your suggestion.

Mr. SHATTUC. I did not get half through. I claim to know something about railroad matters and railway men; most of them are gentlemen, and I undertake to say that there are but few of these societies that have had anything to do with this agitation, and that there is but one man who is presuming to represent them all and everything. I want to say, further, that this House is entitled to both sides of this question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say——

Mr. SHATTUC (continuing). I think I know a little about this question myself, and I say there is no such situation as the gentleman states to this House, that petitions are coming from all these railroad men. There are but few of these societies out of all these societies in the United States that have had anything to do with this matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me explain to my friend. I have had these letters from all these organizations: The railroad brakemen—whatever the titles of their societies are—the firemen, the conductors, and from the engineers, under the official seals of their order. Now, whether that is a forgery or not I do not know. I think they were genuine, and they have come from every State in the Union.

Mr. WANGER. Did not the gentleman receive a telegram, coming to us simply responsive to the request of the legislative representative here in Washington?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Clerk to read in my time the document that I sent to the desk, which will be a full answer to the gentleman's question.

The SPEAKER. The document will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, December 2, 1901.

To whom these presents may concern, greeting:

This is to certify that the bearer hereof, Mr. H. R. Fuller, whose signature appears below, has been duly chosen to serve as the representative of the above-named organizations at Washington, D. C., during the sessions of the Fifty-seventh Congress, in matters pertaining to national legislation.

P. M. ARTHUR,
Grand Chief Engineer, B. of L. E.
F. P. SARGENT,
Grand Master, B. of L. F.
E. E. CLARK,
Grand Chief Conductor, O. of R. C.
P. H. MORRISSEY,
Grand Master, B. of R. T.
H. B. PERHAM,
President, O. of R. T.

H. R. FULLER, Representative.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to my friend——

Mr. SHATTUC. About that letter——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Wait a minute. I will state to my friend that Mr. Fuller, who bears these credentials, representing these organizations as their representative here in Washington in these matters, asks that these limitations shall be put upon this bill.

Mr. SHATTUC. I do not see anything in this letter about this question at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He is here under their general instructions. Besides that, we have had letters and telegrams from each one of these organizations in reference to this very matter.

Mr. SHATTUC. I would like to say Mr. Fuller undertakes to get himself into everything. He seems to be everything, and on the top of everything, and undertakes to run everybody. He is very officious and impertinent. I do not think there is any kind of legislation that comes before Congress, whether it is legislation on taxation or appropriation bills, railway or any other kind, but that this man presumes to attend to it on the part of railroad men, and his manners are bad. He does not act or look like a railroader. He was asked to remove himself from my office for being impertinent and insulting.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not arguing the question. Mr. Fuller claims to be the representative of these men and says that they ought to be protected, and for that reason I am in favor of this measure.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama can not have the welfare and safety of railway trainmen nearer to heart than I; and, as I remarked the other day, it seemed to me when this proposition was first presented that Congress could not go too far in holding the railroad companies to strict requirements for the fullest use of appliances for the air braking of trains. And it is only after a careful consideration and study of the whole question that I believe that the amendment of the House as it passed the House better safeguards the lives and limbs of the railway trainmen than the proposition asked for by the accredited representative of these orders, and also because I believe the request is in some respects unreasonable that the House votes instructions at this time.

I live in a town where many railway trainmen reside. They are my personal and political friends. None of them has ever asked me for a line of legislation on this subject. None of them has ever addressed me with reference to this matter. Therefore, I take it that the individual railway operative is not so painfully distressed about this legislation as are some other gentlemen here.

The amendments reported by this House originally upon this bill were exactly as they were asked for by this representative, as they were strengthened in their provisions by my humble self, for a part of these provisions that have been submitted were absolutely useless and would have been inoperative. I added language in order to make them effective, and it was only after that that I seriously began to take up the whole question and to become as thoroughly informed with respect to the matter as I ought to have been from the beginning.

The bill as it was reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce gave the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to withhold the operation of any of its provisions of any character for any period that it might deem necessary. It also gave the power, at the request of this legislative representative, to increase the minimum number of cars that could be operated with air. That would undoubtedly have led to orders by the Interstate Commerce Commission that the provision requiring 50 per cent of air-braked cars in every train to be used should not be operative as to certain carriers for a certain length of time, for while 50 or 75 per cent of their cars used in interstate commerce may be equipped, this bill is intended to affect all cars which may be in any train where any car engaged in interstate commerce is moved.

The original law only applied to cars when engaged in moving interstate commerce. This bill is intended to apply to all cars in every train where any car is moved in interstate commerce. So that it is far more reaching and drastic in its provisions than the law has heretofore been. It also confers the power on the Interstate Commerce Commission to temporarily reduce the minimum of 50 per cent of air-braked cars. The effect is to take away every excuse for asking for the postponement of the time when the bill was to go into operation in some respects. The effect of it is to introduce a measure of safety on the 1st of September, and to require the companies to have the facilities not only to have the air appliances on their cars, but to have these air appliances effective.

The triple valve in an air brake is a delicate piece of mechanism. Freight cars are not like a railway engine, with somebody greatly interested in their appearance and in the perfection of every detail. It requires appliances in every railway yard to keep these air appliances effective. The air hose is liable to rot and be torn. Instead of uncoupling the air hose when cars are uncoupled and taken apart, too often they are allowed to pull the air coupling apart, and the hose is thereby weakened. There is practically little danger to anybody on a train of 90 cars with modern couplings, where the grades are not heavy, when 30 of them are well equipped with air hose. When all 90 are equipped, there is danger introduced by the peril that somewhere in the other 60 are defective hose, and from the further peril that the pump on the engine is not sufficient to effectively apply the brakes. It is not a matter of simply asking and requiring railway companies to effectively use the air appliances that they have.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WANGER. I will.

Mr. SHATTUC. I hold in my hand the purported authorization of this gentleman to represent the railroad employees on this floor in the pending case. It is dated December 2, 1901. I do not understand that this bill was before Congress December 2, 1901, and therefore this certificate of this gentleman of the right to represent the railroad employees in this particular bill is not authorized. We know whom he represents chiefly in Washington, and that is he represents himself, and in a very bad way, too. On most every bill that comes up in this House, and before almost every committee in this House, he appears, and it would be impossible for him to submit all the different propositions to the railroad men for advice, and if he can not have his own way he becomes insulting, and in one instance at least his conduct was resented, and he was asked to remove himself from the office he was trying to run.

Mr. WANGER. I have the telegrams that came from the Brotherhood; there are probably no two that have reached me that are alike in substance, showing that may of the senders had no idea what they were telegraphing about, but were simply responding to a request from Washington that they communicate.

In one instance—I am sorry I have not the papers at hand; I did not know that this matter would be up this morning—I received a telegram stating that the lodge was decidedly opposed to the amendments to the Senate bill. A letter came asking me to do the best I could to promote the safety of the railway employees, leaving the matter to my judgment as to what was the way in which such safety might be best promoted.

Now, here is a request from Tucson, Ariz., addressed by telegraph to MARCUS A. SMITH, our esteemed friend from that Territory:

Kindly use all your influence to pass Foraker safety-appliance bill, S. 3560.

Now, none of these orders ask to have that bill passed as it passed the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WANGER. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did not the Foraker safety-appliance bill require absolutely that 65 per cent of the cars should be coupled together?

Mr. WANGER. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As it came from the Senate?

Mr. WANGER. It required that on every car that was equipped the appliance should be used unless, independent of such cars, 65 per cent of the cars in a train were so equipped and the appliances in a condition to be operated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And there were to be 65 per cent equipped?

Mr. WANGER. To that extent it did require it—in condition to be operated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did it not fix that minimum?

Mr. WANGER. Only in the way I have mentioned.

Mr. HEPBURN. Allow me to say that the 65 per cent to which the gentleman refers was fixed in the House bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but this bill was reported later, at the instance of these gentlemen who represent the trainmen.

Mr. WANGER. Only 65 per cent was asked for by that bill under any circumstances. This bill asks for 50 per cent plus all the other cars which are equipped, which may be coupled with that 50 per cent.

Mr. RYAN. Was there any request on the part of Mr. Fuller, representing the railroad employees, to reduce the minimum to 50 per cent, or was there any request from anybody except the Commission over here to reduce the minimum to less than 50 per cent?

Mr. WANGER. The proposition to change from 65 to 50 per cent was made, as I understand, by the convention of the representatives of the different orders, whose agent Mr. Fuller is, and whose request he brought to me.

Now, when there was a question whether our committee should have jurisdiction over this bill, and I stated to Mr. Fuller that I did not believe it could get jurisdiction except by putting in that amendment, he said: "Well, don't put that in. Strike out the 50 per cent requirement. Strike out all requirements as to a percentage, and only require those cars which happen to be coupled together in front to have their appliances used." I can only think, Mr. Speaker, that there has been this confusion from the fact that certain gentlemen conferred on this measure and agreed on certain provisions without calling Mr. Fuller into their conference.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman allow me a word? Reference has been made here to hearings before the Senate committee. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it is not a fact that before our committee—the committee of the House—reported these amendments we had full and exhaustive hearings and brought out all the conditions upon which we based our action?

Mr. WANGER. That is certainly the fact; and it certainly appeared in the very first hearing before our committee. No fact then testified to has been controverted. It was shown that with the modern system of coupling there is very little jar. The main thing is to have enough air to control the train. The whole foundation of the argument about the jar has been taken away by the introduction of the modern couplings, which bring the cars close against each other.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Is it not a fact that when this amendment which the gentleman is discussing was brought before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce it was understood that it was generally acceptable to all the parties interested; and was not that fact so stated before the committee—that there was no objection made to it?

Mr. WANGER. That was the understanding at a conference between one railway operative representing the employees, one railway operative representing the railway companies, and another gentleman entirely disinterested as to either party.

Mr. ADAMSON. And the understanding was that it was acceptable to all parties concerned?

Mr. WANGER. Certainly. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK].

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, there is one thing I believe the House ought to consider in connection with this matter, and that is this: In the late years of prosperity the railroads have been called upon to transport great quantities of merchandise under conditions never before imposed, so that employees have been required to work longer hours and the capacity of the roads taxed to their utmost limit. For this reason it has been necessary, not only for the safety of employees, but for the general public, that every safety appliance known should be brought into operation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of this House to this fact, that since the 1st of January of this year there have probably been more deaths from railroad accidents than in any other like period in the history of this country. I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] that I have had from practically every railway organization in Wisconsin—State and local, made up of gentlemen many of whom I know well, among the best citizens of our State—indorsements of this proposition, saying that it was absolutely necessary with the increased business and the volume which the railroads were trying to handle; and it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that putting this in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission to cut down this minimum of 50 per cent will practically nullify the legislation and do away with the good results that are intended to be brought about.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that very frequently there is not 5 per cent of air used on these freight trains.

Mr. BABCOCK. And I would suggest to the gentleman that often there are accidents which would be prevented if there was sufficient air for the engineer to handle his train.

Mr. WANGER. And I would suggest further to the gentleman that all of these disastrous instances of loss of life have occurred where the trains were equipped from end to end with air appliances.

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, that may be.

Mr. WANGER. And there was not one instance proved before either committee of either House where death was clearly traceable to insufficient use of air.

Mr. BABCOCK. Why, the gentleman will prove next that air brakes are not necessary at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin was granted two minutes. His time has expired.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I would ask how much time the gentleman from Iowa desires?

Mr. HEPBURN. Five minutes.

Mr. WANGER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I condole with my friend from Alabama under this great pressure of correspondence which has been placed upon him. Hundreds of letters from every State in the Union makes a very large correspondence. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has been so occupied with his correspondence that I am afraid he has not taken the time to read this bill. He did not state the provisions of the bill. He stated only a part of them. The bill provides that 50 per cent of all cars in a train shall be provided with air brakes and shall be so coupled as to be under the control of the engineer. It further provides that all other cars that are provided with air brakes which are associated with the 50 per cent shall also be coupled and be under the control of the engineer.

Now, as existing law provides that within a very short period all cars shall be equipped with air appliances, this bill means that in a brief period every car shall be provided with air brakes, and coupled, and shall be under the control of the engineer. That is the provision. Now, to relieve from the harshness of that and the unnecessary provisions of that, this provision has been inserted which gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission in a stated case, after a full hearing, the power, for a brief period, to lessen the minimum of cars. That is all there is in it, and it is a right and proper thing, and in the interests of the life and limb of the employee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Iowa state to me why his committee originally reported this bill without this vast and important provision in it, if it were so in the interests of life and limb? The committee reported the bill here with only 50 per cent, without any provision granting this power to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HEPBURN. The effort at legislation originated in the House and a House bill was reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce fixing the minimum of cars to be provided with air brakes at 65, with the contentment of all the gentlemen who assume here to represent and to dictate what the legislation of this House shall be—65 per cent. It was their provision. They were content with it. Then came over the Senate bill, and there was an attempt at once made to secure a favorable report for that—and without much of consideration, in fact, with but very little of additional consideration—that bill, by a bare majority on an occasion when the committee was not full, was favorably reported. When the attention of the committee was called to the fact, however, that this provided for the use of all of these cars, that all should be equipped and so coupled and under the control of the engineer, and that that was entirely unnecessary in very many instances, then this other provision was, as a committee amendment, agreed to.

Now, that is all there is in it. Mr. Speaker, I believe that no set of men have the interests of the train men and the railway employees more at heart than have the majority of that committee. We want to give them every possible security within our power, notwithstanding the security they are asking for is against their own negligence. Remember, gentlemen, that these efforts are to secure employees against the negligence of their fellow-employees. It is not the stockholders, it is not the directors, it is not the management of railways that are guilty of negligence; and casualty is almost in every instance the result of negligence. Casualty usually occurs because some employee has been negligent, has refused or neglected to perform his duty, and it is against such men that legislation is imperatively necessary.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WANGER. I do.

Mr. CANNON. In the Senate amendment, lines 8, 9, and 10, I find the following provision:

> And provided that in no case shall such reduction permit the running of any train with less power or train brakes than are required by section 1 of the act of March 2, 1893.

Now, what is required by that section?

Mr. WANGER. What is required by that section is sufficient air appliances to enable the locomotive engineer to control the train.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania himself states that they often go out with only five cars coupled up under that law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Five cars in a train of how many cars?

Mr. WANGER. Oh, sometimes forty. Now I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that the motion to instruct the conferees ought to prevail. I have no doubt whatever that the gentlemen who are named as the conferees in this case from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, who have listened long and patiently to the hearings upon this subject, will be able in conference, if left unhampered, to produce a bill which will be satisfactory to the railway employees.

It should not be considered, Mr. Speaker, that because Mr. Fuller is here representing certain railway employees there is no division of sentiment on the part of employees in reference to the passage of this bill. I think every member of our committee has received a communication from all of the railway employees of the city of St. Louis, protesting against any bill requiring the coupling up of too many cars with safety appliances in a train. The reason for that is not hard to understand.

The gentleman from Wisconsin refers to the large number of accidents to railway employees. Mr. Speaker, the reports which are now filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission show that the greatest number of accidents from any one cause to railroad employees is from coupling up safety brakes on the cars in making up the train. There is no other cause of accident so serious as the coupling up of the safety or air brakes in the yards. Now, it would seem a preposterous proposition that more cars should be compelled to be coupled up than are necessary. Gentlemen can very well understand that on a road which runs through the mountains and up and down steep grades a much larger number of safety air brakes is required to control the train than on a train which runs slowly perhaps, and certainly over a prairie, on a level track. The amendment as it stands proposes to confer some authority upon some body, an able body, a body which has the confidence both of the employees and the railroad companies, to determine that there should be more cars with safety brakes coupled up or that there should be less, as occasion requires. It seems to me a very sensible provision.

Remember, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that while the law requires couplings between cars which will couple themselves, automatic couplers, there is no automatic coupler of safety air brakes in use. Whenever a coupling is made in a yard between two cars, in order to connect the air brakes a switchman must get down between the cars and make the coupling. It is preposterous to say that there ought to be more of these couplings made than is necessary in order properly to control the train and save the lives of the men on the train. The proposition of the gentleman from Alabama is, possibly, to save, in some exceptional case, the life of a trainman on the train, but to jeopardize the lives of the switchmen in the yards in order to do it. I hope the motion will not prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. WANGER. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire time?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Three minutes. I do not think the motion of my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] ought to prevail for this reason: Certainly the whole object, spirit, and purpose of this amendment is to meet certain emergencies and exigencies that may and will arise in the course of operating a railroad train. The object is to better protect human life. I do not think we have given sufficient attention to the language in the words of this amendment. Now, it will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that in one part of this amendment, "after a full hearing on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the percentage may be increased by the Interstate Commerce Commission," and then below that, in the same paragraph, it says "from time to time, after a full hearing, the Interstate Commerce Commission may decrease the percentage." First, the Interstate Commerce Commission may increase and then it may decrease the minimum of 50 per cent. So that shows upon its face that it leaves it entirely to the Interstate Commerce Commission, if we have any confidence in that Commission, to judge as to these exigencies when they arise, and, as I said before, they necessarily will arise in the administration of these matters, to decrease or increase according to the necessities and exigencies of conditions and circumstances that surround the situation.

Then I say that the whole question necessarily reduces itself to the proposition as to whether we are willing to leave this important matter relative to the administration of railroad matters in the hands of a chosen commission of five commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, three from one party and two from the other. That is the whole question, in my judgment, Mr. Speaker. The real effect of this amendment will be to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to avoid suspending the law on application of a railroad, which has been done so often in the past few years. Our Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, after a most elaborate hearing on this question, after hearing the ablest and most distinguished men representing the interests of those who are employed by the different railroads and the employers and giving it full weight and full consideration, thought that the best, most conservative, wholesome, and reasonable provision that we could make in this matter for the protection of the lives and limbs of those employed is to leave it in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission to say when the minimum of the percentage of 50 per cent equipment of air brakes should be increased or decreased. After careful consideration I believe the discretion left to the Interstate Commerce Commission will greatly tend to preserve human life among those operating trains. I certainly desire to do all in my power to secure that end. It is a reasonable condition and seems to me to be fair and just to all parties interested.

Mr. WANGER. I ask for a vote.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman allow me two minutes?

Mr. WANGER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this question is simply one of granting power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the minimum number of cars to be operated by the use of safety appliances. What is the necessity of granting this Commission that power when in the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House and also of the Senate it was shown that at least 76 per cent of all freight cars in this country are equipped with power brakes. That being the case, having more than three-fourths of all the cars equipped with power brakes, there is no necessity for granting power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce the minimum number of cars to be operated below 50 per cent. They can not be increased over 50 per cent, except by the power of this same Commission. This question ought not to be determined here by the personal feelings of the members of this House toward people who are not members; it ought to be decided on the merits, and with a view of protecting the lives of not only the employees but the traveling public of this country; and I do not believe that any necessity has been shown why this power should be given.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? The gentleman speaks of protecting the lives of the traveling public. Does not the gentleman know that all passenger cars are provided with these appliances, and that all of them are used?

Mr. RYAN. I know they are.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then what effect can that have upon the safety of passengers?

Mr. RYAN. In answer to that question I will say that wrecks of freight trains occur by reason of not being properly equipped with air brakes, and these freight cars are thrown on other tracks and very serious wrecks of passenger trains have taken place in consequence. It is to prevent such occurrences that this law ought to be enforced, and the minimum number of cars in a train equipped and operated ought not to be reduced below 50 per cent. I hope the conferees will be instructed to recede from the House amendment giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to reduce the minimum number of cars in a train to be equipped and operated by power brakes.

Mr. WANGER. In reply to the remarks of my friend from New York, I desire to say that all friends of railroad trainmen who want to see an effective provision for the protection of these men inaugurated at the earliest practical date suggested, to wit, September 1, will vote down the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, and thereby probably secure upon the statute books a law which will lead to the earliest and most general use of air appliances, which can be enforced and which will be enforced, a result which the committee is earnestly striving to obtain. If, however, gentlemen are indifferent to the main question and prefer to simply follow the beck and call of the legislative representative of certain orders, then of course they will vote for the motion to instruct the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 80.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-seven gentleman have arisen—just a sufficient number—and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The other side was taken.

The SPEAKER. Seventy-eight gentleman have arisen. The yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 81, answered "present" 12, not voting 143; as follows:

Mr. HAMILTON with Mr. CLARK.

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. WHEELER.

On this vote:

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin with Mr. HOOKER.

Mr. BURLEIGH with Mr. FLEMING.

Mr. ADAMS with Mr. BELLAMY.

Mr. LONG with Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. HEATWOLE with Mr. LEWIS of Georgia.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont with Mr. POU.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. DAVIS of Florida.

Mr. BOREING with Mr. LINDSAY.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio with Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Mr. MCCALL with Mr. NAPHEN.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye," but I find that I am paired with my colleague, Mr. JACKSON, and I wish to withdraw my vote.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. SCOTT, and he answered "present," as above recorded.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye," and I find that my pair is absent, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BELMONT, and he answered "present," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WANGER, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. ADAMSON.

SANITARY CONVENTION OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, concerning the transactions of the first international sanitary convention of the American Republics, held at Washington in December, 1902.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KLEBERG, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for the balance of the session, on account of important business.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes. Pending this motion, I should be glad to ascertain whether we can agree on time for general debate. I should like to finish the bill to-day. It seems to me there will be sufficient opportunity for discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There is one request on our side for five minutes. If the chairman of the committee [Mr. CANNON] will agree to that, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. CANNON. Then I ask unanimous consent that all general debate in Committee of the Whole terminate in five minutes.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The motion of Mr. CANNON was then agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. TAWNEY in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of this bill be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] five minutes for general debate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT].

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to observe the customary silence of a member in his first Congress and I had hoped, from the signs, that I should be able to observe it to the end of the session. But having been placed on a committee, much against my wishes, I find to-day that I am obliged to break that silence. My objection to being on this committee was my thorough and absolute opposition to subsidies, that is, general subsidies as provided for in this bill. At the same time I have always been an ardent believer that something should be done for the encouragement and development of our merchant marine, and have no doubt that if a vote were taken in this House on the simple question whether something should be done for the merchant marine or not, this House would declare itself in the affirmative almost unanimously. Mr. Chairman, in opposing this bill I want it clearly understood that my opposition is not to helping the merchant marine, but is to the system and method selected by the majority for reaching this object.

You gentlemen on the other side of the House have your ear closer to the ground to listen for the first move of public opinion. Not that you wish to obey that call of the people, but that you wish to know, so that if it is not to your interest to meet it, to study some way of avoiding it. There has been in late years a general recognition of the fact that our great prosperity should be shared by this interest in shipping. There has been a desire to advance in this branch of commerce at least equally with the other great nations of the world. There has been a desire, a strong, heartfelt desire, to see the American flag wave in all the ports throughout the world. But, Mr. Chairman, that desire does not mean that the people wish to start on a new policy, on a policy adopted only by monarchies and empires.

Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with some of the members of this House in opposing this bill on the ground that the merchant marine does not require aid from the Government. I do not agree with them when they assert certain facts, such as cheapness of production of materials entering into the construction of ships; or again, when they refer to the law which admits all materials for the construction of ships free of duty, and claim that such protection is sufficient for the shipbuilder. I do not agree with them when they denounce the shipbuilder, in the same terms as the shipowner, as behind this subsidy bill. It is very true that the shipbuilders are anxious that Congress should enact some law which would either directly or indirectly assist them. But, Mr. Chairman, I speak from personal knowledge of shipbuilders when I say they are not so anxious for this subsidy bill as they are anxious for a law which will create a demand for their ships. I do not agree with this attack on the shipbuilding interest. Mr. Chairman, the art of shipbuilding is one of the most intricate and most scientific, and calls for a mental quality far higher than is required in the ordinary channels of industry. It requires not only a thorough mechanic, scientist, and most consummate mathematician, but it also requires the elements of genius, the elements that go to make the great artist—in other words, the elements that are required in architecture, the highest grade of artistic science. You can not make the shipbuilder by mere education. The successful shipbuilder must have the elements of genius; and the proof of this, Mr. Chairman, is that the designers employed to-day in the great shipbuilding yards are graduates of the highest standing of either our greatest scientific schools or of our great naval school at Annapolis.

Mr. Chairman, I just referred to the fact that the gentlemen on the other side of this House belonged to a party whose ear was always close to the ground. And when I said that, I referred to the fact that they listened closely to hear this great call for the development of our merchant marine. And hearing the call, the leaders wisely said to themselves, How shall this call be answered? In examining the case thoroughly, and I think wisely, they came to the conclusion that the first legislation on this question, introduced by that great Democrat, James Madison, was the correct solution. And six States, though I may be mistaken in regard to the number—I believe Massachusetts was one of them—in their State conventions in 1896 inserted in their platforms a plank demanding the restoration of our merchant marine by a discriminating tariff. Following these State conventions, their national convention had this clause in its platform:

> We favor restoring the early American policy of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of our merchant marine and the protection of our shipping in the foreign carrying trade, so that the American ships—the product of American labor, employed in American shipyards, sailing under the Stars and Stripes, and manned, officered, and owned by Americans—may regain the carrying of our foreign commerce. (Republican national platform, 1896.)

Mr. McKinley, indorsing this very plank of the platform, wrote the following in his letter of acceptance:

> The declaration of the Republican platform in favor of the upbuilding of our merchant marine has my hearty approval. The policy of discriminating duties in favor of our shipping which prevailed in the early years of our history should be again promptly adopted by Congress and vigorously supported until our prestige and supremacy on the seas are fully attained. We should no longer contribute directly or indirectly to the maintenance of the colossal marine of foreign countries, but provide an efficient and complete marine of our own.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what was the result? The battle of 1896 was fought, the Republican victory was complete, and you could have passed any law called for by your platform that you desired. But as soon as the Republican party was well in the seat of government and their method of procedure established and entered upon, these large combinations of railroads, called the railroad trust, in conjunction with the combination of the shipping interest, which takes in both the American system and the European lines under the control of American capital, said, "No; this is not what the shipping interest requires. This system, advocated in the platform and indorsed prior to the election, is wrong and in direct opposition to our treaties with foreign nations; it will interfere with our commercial interests; this is not the way; this is not what is required. What is required is the system followed by the governments of the great nations of Europe." And they state the examples of Germany, England, France, and all the rest, tailing on Japan. But, Mr. Chairman, will the Republican party assume the position that there were no men familiar with international law, no statesmen of any kind or of any weight who framed their State platforms or, more collectively, their national platform? Were there no men in the party at any of their conventions who understood the conditions existing when they drew up the plank that I have just read?

Was the man who was chosen at that time as the great statesman to lead that party to victory—was that man, whom all respect to-day, and all mourn—was that man not a statesman? Then, if so, let anybody on that side of the House tell me how all these statesmen, all these lawyers, could have been mistaken, could have studied this question, and then gone to the people and promised them the development of the merchant marine which was asked for. Let anybody on the other side of the House tell me how it was possible that men who did know the law could have made such a mistake; that no sooner were they elected than they discovered that everything they had suggested was wrong, born of ignorance or bred of deceit.

Mr. Chairman, in stating my reasons for objecting to this measure I will not attempt to use new methods or interject new ideas. There are no new methods, there are no new ideas, on this question. It has been thoroughly threshed, and I wish it particularly understood that I do not assume to be the author or inventor of anything expressed by me here to-day. Whatever I may say has been said or written by others. My conclusions are based simply on the reading which I have done on this question. That reading has been very slight in comparison to the literature on the subject. My time has not been sufficient to do it full justice. It would take years of reading for a man to read everything on both sides of this question. But I have read sufficiently, I think, to warrant my absolute and unalterable opposition to the bill now before the House. In the first place, I have often heard this remark in advocating free ships, "Let us go back to the old system of free ships." Mr. Chairman, we have never had free ships, and, furthermore, I find that all the great maritime nations—and by that I mean the successful maritime nations—have always had a system, either direct or indirect, of protecting their shipping. It is very customary to point to England as the most conspicuous example of a nation which has developed the greatest sea power known to modern days under a system of free ships. And this fact is most energetically pointed to by the free-traders as a clinching argument for the position taken.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, England has, from her very earliest history, followed a system of direct protection and encouragement to the merchant marine until the year 1850. And from that time on she has had a double system of protection—one, a postal subsidy or contract, which I will refer to again, and the other, trade discriminations, not by government law, but by strong commercial organizations, such as Lloyds', insurance companies, boards of trade regulations, and exchange regulations.

England's policy of protection and encouragement to her merchant marine can be traced back to the reign of Alfred the Great, who fostered British shipping to the Mediterranean and the Levant by building and hiring vessels to merchants and supplying them with means for the purpose of trading. We find that this was carried on by Edward the Confessor in establishing the Cinque Ports for the protection of the mariners of Kent and Sussex, granting Palatine jurisdiction under a lord warden, which freed them from the civil and military administration of the counties of Kent and Sussex.

This system of encouragement was carried on by the successive rulers of England through the reigns of Elizabeth and the Stuarts, and emphasized under the rule of Cromwell in the celebrated navigation act of 1650. And now let me stop just here to call to the attention of gentlemen who believe in free trade or the principles of free trade what Adam Smith has to say on this very question. This question, Mr. Chairman, of merchant marine, has two sides to it; first, the side of commerce and trade, which is merely commercial, and, second, that of defense, which is purely political; and it is impossible to in any way separate these two qualities. The merchant marine is required to carry on the trade of a nation, and it is also the cradle of the seamen who are to be employed on the warships that protect that commerce and the life of the nation.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to bore the House by reading extracts, but I trust the House will allow me to read the following lines of Adam Smith on this question. Speaking of the navigation act under Cromwell, he says:

> The act of navigation is not favorable to foreign commerce or to the growth of that opulence which can arise from it. The interest of a nation in its commercial relations to foreign nations is, like that of a merchant with regard to the different people with whom he deals, to buy as cheap and to sell as dear as possible. But it will be most likely to buy cheap when, by the most perfect freedom of trade, it encourages all nations to bring to it the goods which it has occasion to purchase; and, for the same reason, it will be most likely to sell dear when its markets are thus filled with the greatest number of buyers.

The act of navigation, it is true, lays no burden upon foreign ships that come to export the produce of British industry. Even the ancient aliens duty, which used to be paid upon all goods exported as well as imported, has, by several subsequent acts, been taken off from the greater part of the articles of exportation. But if foreigners, either by prohibitions or high duties, are hindered from coming to sell, they can not always afford to come to buy, because, coming without a cargo, they must lose the freight from their own country to Great Britain. By diminishing the number of sellers, therefore, we necessarily diminish that of buyers, and are thus likely not to buy foreign goods dearer but to sell our own cheaper than if there was a more perfect freedom of trade. As defense, however, is of much more importance than opulence, the act of navigation is, perhaps, the wisest of all the commercial regulations of England.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this navigation act, referred to by Adam Smith, was the prohibitory system of duties continued by England all through our colonial days and early national history, modified in 1815 and 1828, and abandoned in 1850, to be followed, as I have said, by a new and quite as efficient a discriminating system through commercial organizations. This system is as strong to-day as it ever was, and should it ever be weakened it is easy to see, by reading the parliamentary reports of the special naval committee, that England is ready to go to any extreme to protect and maintain the ascendency of her merchant marine.

A question before that committee was, "Then you believe that we should resort to any lawful means to maintain our share of shipping?" The answer was "Yes." "And by that you mean a large share?" The answer was, "I most certainly do." And the report, generally speaking, can be said to entirely oppose general subsidies, not from any antagonism to the word "subsidy," but from the fact that the evidence produced at this inquiry went to prove that subsidies were useless in developing shipping and were by way of injuring the efficiency of existing lines and injuring the tramp interest. Yet, in going over that report, it is quite evident that England, also regarding this question as a political one, is considering the closing of her coastwise trade, which would include the trade with her colonies and dependencies, and if that were not sufficient to go to the extent of running lines free of charge, paying their expenses by levying duties on imports from countries encouraging their merchant marine by systems of subsidies. This, Mr. Chairman, is the position that free-ship England takes in maintaining her merchant marine.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are three great objections to this bill: First, is the fact of putting a hand in the Treasury and taking the taxes paid in by the people and handing it deliberately to private individuals for private interests; in other words, "robbing Paul to pay Peter." Another is, that many eminent lawyers are of the opinion that this bill providing for general subsidies is unconstitutional. A third reason is, that this bill will not do that which it pretends to do; that is, it will not develop the merchant marine, but will simply go into the pockets of the shipping combination that exists to-day.

In discussing the merchant marine we might divide the subject into six parts:

1. The policy of letting well enough alone, or doing nothing.
2. The policy of free ships; other methods imply governmental or powerful private aid.
3. Bounties or subsidies.
4. Discriminating duties—imposing extra duties on goods imported in foreign ships.
5. Discriminating duties—paying rebates of duties on goods imported in ships of American registry.
6. Trade regulations controlled by powerful private organizations, which can only be enforced by a great sea power with an established merchant marine, such as England.

The first method can be eliminated, as the mere discussion of this question implies a desire to improve the condition of the merchant marine.

The second is to be disposed of by the fact that such a condition has never existed in this country. All nations that have been successful in maintaining a merchant marine have either excluded foreign ships or imposed trade regulations, sustained by government act or private corporations. Exceptions to this rule have proved failures, such as Italy and, notably, France. If applied in this country, it would be dangerous—if it were not as impossible to accomplish as to reach an absolute condition of free trade—from the fact that it would destroy our shipbuilding interest, which has only been maintained by reserving the coastwise trade to our own ships, a system adopted by all nations of the world with the exception of England, and she is now becoming alarmed at the great interest taken by the various nations of the world in the importance of maintaining and protecting their merchant marine, and she is also considering the advisability of reserving her coastwise trade, including the trade between her colonies and dependencies, to her own ships, so as to offset the German incursion and the expected revival of interest in the merchant marine of our own country.

She is ready to go even further, in so far as to impose duties on goods imported from nations supporting their marine by general subsidies, and, lastly, but none the less important, the admission of free ships would create the greatest and most invulnerable international monopoly that the world has known or dreamed of by admitting the ships of the shipping trust or combine, which would maintain itself against all comers by a system of railroad protection similar to that adopted by the German Government in maintaining her merchant marine, which plays a more important part in the maintaining of the German merchant marine than its system of either postal or general subsidies.

In discussing objections to the first method—that is, leaving well enough alone or doing nothing—there is undoubtedly a universal and perfectly proper feeling that the merchant marine should share in the general prosperity and development of this country. Further, that our new position in the East demands the development of both the merchant marine and the Navy. This is entirely independent of any opinion that may be held regarding our permanently holding the Philippines, inasmuch as we would retain naval and coaling stations in the event of our turning over the islands to the natives for self-government, in order to protect our expected future Eastern trade. And secondly, that it is to be supposed that we are not going to build the Panama Canal at a cost of from two hundred to four hundred million dollars to see the flags of all nations pass through it in foreign commerce and only ships in the coasting trade pass through under our flag.

Having satisfactorily, I think, disposed of the first and second methods to be pursued, either from the impracticable or unwise policy or from the fact that the national pride of this country demands an encouragement of our merchant marine, we come to the third method—subsidy, which the Republican party has been trying in every way to force through Congress. Subsidy is un-American, perhaps unconstitutional, not adapted to the principles of a Republic, and, finally, inefficient as to results unless supplemented by either government or controlling private trade regulations, but subsidies have to be met as they are adopted by the leading foreign nations.

Subsidies are classified, and I think misleadingly, as postal subsidy and general subsidy. The word "subsidy" has acquired a meaning of generosity, and rightly so, in this country, from the methods used by the Republican party in employing it. The payments made by the Government for actual postal service are perfectly sound and correct, but, it would seem, might better be referred to as postal contracts, leaving the word subsidy to stand for the generous gifts proposed to be given by the Republicans from the National Treasury for mere navigation under a doubtful classification without service rendered.

Postal contracts are difficult to limit and define. The general principle that should be followed is to pay such rates as maintain existing competing lines, and to be honestly and wisely increased to meet extra expenses and risks in establishing new lines. In fact, these new lines may be regarded as scouting expeditions tending to the development of new trade. Foreign governments have adopted this plan, and so have we by the postal act of 1891, and no fault has been found with the policy, with the exception that perhaps we are more generous than other nations. Yet this can be accounted for by the fact that our shipping interests receive no other important aid, excepting, perhaps, free materials for shipping construction, which is, however, partly offset by existing Treasury regulations.

This form of subsidy is the only one that has been and is recognized by England, and has been maintained with the double object of developing new trade as well as maintaining connections with her colonies and dependencies. The result of the special committee appointed by Parliament would go to show that general subsidies are inadvisable and unnecessary, for the reason that they are apt to be swallowed up by existing and successful great lines, and are by way of interfering with the cargo ships by strengthening the shipping rings.

Testimony before this committee also went to show that the highest subsidized company, namely, the P. & O. Steam Navigation Company, gave poor service in comparison to other lines doing the same service, with many other complaints not necessary to mention in this discussion. In fact, the position that England takes may be best expressed by quoting the first clause of the recommendations of the committee, which is as follows:

Section 1, article 51. That a general system of subsidies is very inexpedient and very expensive.

Section 9, article 51, is their report on the coastwise trade:

That in view of the action of foreign nations, the occasion has come for favorably considering the qualified reservation of British coasting trade throughout the whole Empire by exacting a fine or license from foreign ships engaging in British imperial coasting trade, computed on the basis of any subsidy from which they benefit. The assent of our colonies would be required.

It is important to observe that the witnesses before this committee, though believers in the principles of free trade, without exception regarded the shipping interest from two points of view—the commercial and the political. From the commercial point of view the tendency of the testimony was for as little Government interference as possible; whereas, from the political point of view, to go to any extreme necessary.

Sir Robert Giffen, K. C. B., head of the Statistical and Commercial Department of the Board of Trade, afterwards of the Commercial, Labor, and Statistical Department for over twenty years, in answer to the chairman with regard to reserving the Imperial coastwise trade to British ships, testified as to its advisability and propriety at length, and added:

If the matter should become serious enough the Government ought not to shrink from a last step—that is, to run ships on certain lines to bring goods for nothing to English ports—no freight at all—so as to extinguish, by making unprofitable, the unfair competition. By levying a duty upon all goods imported from the countries concerned we should cover the cost of running free ships, and we should lose nothing. It would not matter to consumers whether they paid the cost of carriage of goods to this country in the form of prices which included freight or in form of duties charged by the Government in lieu of freight to pay for the cost of carrying the goods. I do not believe so extreme a measure will be necessary, but it should be kept in reserve.

Q. That would be an extreme measure, would it not?

A. It would be an extreme measure, but we must have the ships and maintain them in time of peace so that we may have them in time of war. We should not stop at anything to get the ships demanded.

Q. Some of the suggestions you have made call to mind the old navigation laws, do they not?

A. That is no doubt the effect of them. What I have said is, in fact, a proposal to revive in part the navigation laws which were abolished amid great applause half a century ago, and the excuse is the change of circumstances. (Sections 178 in part, 179, and part of 180, Parliamentary Report.)

It is important, however, to remember that the commercial end is very carefully and efficiently guarded by Lloyds' requirements and the regulations of the boards of trade.

Germany may be taken as the next example of a successful result under a system of subsidy. The giant strides of Germany in developing her merchant marine are by way of misleading the supporters of subsidy measures. It is very true that Germany, in her desire to develop her navy, has given every government aid at her disposal, namely, postal contracts to existing lines, subsidy for the establishing of new lines, and general or direct subsidies for general encouragement. The greater part of the latter, however, goes to existing lines. The backbone of this protection is the cheap through freights and railroad facilities which she is able to give by reason of the fact of either owning or controlling her railroad systems. Referring again to the parliamentary report already quoted, Mr. Renwick, a member of Parliament, answering a question of the chairman of the committee, Mr. Evelyn Cecil:

Q. Cheap railway rates in connection with steamships is an indirect form of subsidy of course?

A. Undoubtedly it is the indirect encouragement that we suffer most from. (Section 427, Parliamentary Report.)

On the other hand, Italy and, more especially, France are striking examples of the utter failure and the inefficiency of the system of mere subsidies to shipowners and bounties to shipbuilders unaccompanied by trade regulations, either State or private. The only advance made by France is in the sailing-ship interest, where she meets with no practical competition, and her efforts have resulted in an inefficient merchant marine and a languishing shipbuilding industry, so that she has been forced to the ignominious condition of giving bounties to foreign-bought ships. The parliamentary committee's report referring to this subject of the bounties paid by France to foreign-built ships, says:

The tonnage which may be admitted to the benefits of the present law, in excess of that of vessels registered under the French flag before its promulgation, is fixed at the maximum of 500,000 tons gross for steamers and 100,000 tons gross for sailing vessels. Of the 500,000 tons above mentioned for steamers, two-fifths only can be foreign built, and three-fifths of French construction. (Article 7, page 235 of Parliamentary Report.)

It also appears that French sailing ships can sail in ballast and yet be run profitably, owing to subsidy paid, as we learn again from the above-quoted report, where Mr. Renwick, in answer to a question of the chairman, testified:

Q. In the case of French sailing ships, the French bounties to French sailing ships are very large indeed, are they not?

A. They are so large that I believe it is the fact that large French sailing ships can actually go out to the Pacific in ballast and return in ballast and would not lose money. (Sec. 429, Parliamentary Report.)

The approximate amounts of subsidies paid by foreign nations are as follows: Great Britain, $3,626,250; Germany, $1,737,500; France, $8,256,355; Russia, $1,823,750; Japan, $2,923,480; Italy, limited to $2,000,000 in any one year; Austria, limited to $1,212,500 in any one year. In addition, Suez Canal dues are refunded to companies by the Austrian Government. Austria also pays bounties to her mercantile fleet, and these in 1899 amounted to $291,400. Norway and Sweden, $84,095.

Dutch subsidy law of July 10, 1902, is as follows: "To establish a four-weekly steamship service under the Dutch flag between Java, China, and Japan, calling at Soerabaya, Samarang, Batavia, Hongkong, Shanghai, Yokohama, Kobe, and Amoy. The State has agreed to pay 300,000 florins a year for the first five years, 250,000 florins a year for the second five years, 200,000 florins a year for the third five years, on condition that when the net profits amount to more than 5 per cent on the paid-up capital the State shall receive two-fifths of the surplus, the remaining three-fifths up to a maximum of 4 per cent on the paid-up capital to be retained by the company, and of the remainder, the State to receive three-quarters and the company one-quarter. This to continue until the whole subsidy is repaid.

Mails to be carried free.

United States paid for year ending June 30, 1901, $1,448,968.

The sixth method need not be considered, as this country is not in a position to adopt it.

The fourth and fifth methods remain and are based on sound principles. They are based on the principle laid down by James Madison in introducing the first act of Congress which provides for discriminating duties.

The difference between the fourth and the fifth is merely in its application. In the early days of our country the tariff was low and the first act provided for an addition of 10 per cent on goods imported in foreign ships. Under this wise measure our carrying trade gradually grew until the climax was reached of 90 per cent of our foreign commerce carried in our own ships. Owing to the overestimated strength of our merchant marine and to a desire to overcome British discrimination against our shipping, discriminating duties were abolished in 1815 in the direct trade. Not resulting in any immediate serious injury, our statesmen were encouraged to remove discriminating duties from indirect trade in 1828. Few writers of any note fail to point to this fact as being the first and principal cause of the gradual downfall of our merchant marine. And it is to be noted that though this measure was enacted with the intention of removing all discrimination against our shipping, it was not until 1850 that Great Britain abolished her navigation law, and then for reasons very easily explained. Up to that time we had developed a better type of boat, a more economic system of handling our ships through American inventive genius, which produced labor-saving devices, and though then, as now, the wages of seamen and officers were higher here than in England, we were able to compete with her on even terms. England had reached a new era and intended to revolutionize the whole system of the carrying trade. The development of steam and the cheap production of iron gave her a monopoly of the iron-built steamers. Her great mercantile organizations, Lloyds', boards of trade, and insurance companies were brought into the scheme of developing and protecting the new industry. Her wooden-ship building industry was dying, her seamen and sea captains were in a demoralized condition, and England wisely saw fit to buy and hire better and more efficient ships to tide over the time needed to transfer her shipping from wood to iron and steel. This being accomplished, she promptly threw our ships out by the discriminations of Lloyds' inspection and her other boards of trade measures, which have been developed with much foresight and have all the force of State discriminating legislation.

Hon. W. W. Bates, in his book, American Navigation, speaking of Lloyds', says:

To this day Lloyds' never appointed surveyors to inspect wooden vessels in course of construction in this rival country of ours, though they have sent them to all other countries, and this discrimination was practiced before iron-ship building became an industry in England. From the first a standing rule to give no vessel a full class if not built under survey has been in force, and also another rule, to grant the character A to no vessel unless her date and place of building are known. These needless distinctions and regulations, with others like them, betray their only object—the protection of the British marine.

The British recognize Lloyds' rules as having the force of an act of Parliament, and congratulate themselves that their operation has been beneficial to their own shipping while their rigor has hurt foreign navigation.

The Liverpool Corn Exchange provides that cargoes of grain to be "regular" for sales en route must be British insured, and, referring to the regulations of this exchange, a letter written by William H. C. Fowler, secretary of the California Insurance Company, to the Hon. William W. Bates, Commissioner of Navigation, dated San Francisco, August 25, 1891, contains the following:

You will no doubt be surprised to learn that American insurance companies are tabooed by the Liverpool Corn Exchange from underwriting on our grain exports to Europe, whether by American or foreign vessels.

With the view of protecting their own insurance companies, the rule of the exchange is that these cargoes must be insured in standard English companies. Some years back three of our local companies deposited with English banks at Liverpool the sum of $150,000, which we arranged to keep good at all times, for the better protection of their policy holders in Europe, but our friends, who favored American capital, were forced to go over to the enemy, as to sell their shipments their Liverpool representatives were compelled to take out insurance thereon in English companies, as our policies were positively refused as not being the required protection.

These regulations are just as much in force to-day and as powerful as at any time, and it is a noteworthy fact that one of these organizations, Lloyds', a thorough and far-reaching organization, even went so far as to propose to our Government that we should name as our consuls such men as they might recommend to us, none other than their own agents, and with no other purpose in view than to have them act in collusion with Lloyds' in discriminating against our shipping. As to this I quote from Mr. Bates's book the following letter:

LLOYDS', November 14, 1883.

SIR: I am instructed by the committee of Lloyds' to inform you that in every port in the United Kingdom and other countries of the world there is stationed a Lloyds' agent. These Lloyds' agents are selected for their respectability and commercial capacity by a committee consisting not only of the members of Lloyds', but also of the representatives of the marine-insurance companies of London, as well as the Shipowners' Association and the underwriters' associations of Glasgow.

It is thus believed that the amount of experience and knowledge of the committee answer that Lloyds' agents so selected are most respectable and capable in every way.

I am accordingly to suggest to you that in making the appointment of consular or vice-consular officers at the various ports of Great Britain and Ireland it might possibly be desirable that when all other claims are equal a preference should be given to Lloyds' agents; and I am to say that should you see your way to the adoption of this suggestion, the committee of Lloyds', in case of any application to them, will be most happy to afford you, confidentially, the most complete information in their power with regard to any of their agents respecting whom you might wish to inquire.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

HENRY M. HOZIER, Secretary.

CONSUL-GENERAL FOR THE UNITED STATES,
53 Old Broad street, E. C.

It is worthy the advocates of free ships to note the reasons for England's advocating the free-ship principle. It first allowed her to transfer her shipping from wood to iron and steel, and then allowed her to find a market for her surplus shipbuilding. (It is yet to be seen whether the great sales of her shipping, notably to the American shipping combine, is not by way of doing England more political harm than commercial good.)

The civil war gave the final blow to our foreign shipping, that had been struggling to exist with all Government aid removed, and we are in the proud position to-day of being the sixth nation in foreign commerce with a proportion of 3.4 per cent of the world's total carrying, against England's 56 per cent of the world's carrying, and now we are carrying but 12.1 per cent of our imports and but 6.6 per cent of our exports, as against 90 per cent under the discriminating law.

It is easy to account for the general desire in this country to see our merchant marine restored to its old-time prestige. National pride and patriotism are the first, but sound American business sense is the second. Our great prosperity and the keen competition between nations for commercial supremacy demand that we should be strong enough to protect ourselves, and this means the developing of a strong navy and an efficient one; and it is not sufficient that we should have money enough to build all the best and finest battle ships that are required, but we must have the yards to build them in, the officers to command them, and last, but not least by any means, the men to man them. And this last element is becoming a serious question in England as well as here. The continental powers, Mr. Chairman, have a means of furnishing men for their navies, and it is only through a protected merchant marine that we will be able to produce men for our Navy. It would seem as if national pride, if not national gratitude, would be ready to do anything in the Government's power to encourage an industry which has brightened the pages of our history by acts of daring and heroism. Our early naval heroes sprang from our merchant marine, and in the Revolutionary war our merchant marine did more than the Navy. Marvin, on page 12 of his American Merchant Marine, says: "The American privateers of 1775–1783 captured or destroyed three times as many of the enemy's ships as did our frigates and sloops of war." In our civil war the merchant marine likewise played an important part.

It is perfectly true that the merchant marine could not in these days of modern battle ships and cruisers be adapted to offensive operations, but the men could be used on our naval ships and the ships used in maintaining our commerce, under protection, and in the transportation of troops and supplies, or in the case of war between foreign powers, to carry on the trade which would otherwise be absolutely closed.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to the national pride which calls for the upbuilding of our merchant marine I spoke of the sound American business sense as also demanding it. We have yearly been paying foreigners hundreds of millions of dollars for carrying our imports and exports, and last year it amounted to $250,616,084. We are very prone to flatter ourselves by what we call our balance of trade, which we compute by going through the childish maneuver of subtracting our imports from our exports. I wish here to bring attention to an analysis of the national carrying trade of Great Britain from 1858 to 1876, inclusive, made by one of the leading merchants of Liverpool, Mr. A. D. McKay, which I find in a small volume written by David A. Wells in 1883. I quote the following:

Mr. McKay first shows, from the official figures published by the British Board of Trade, that the entire value of the imports into Great Britain—merchandise, specie, and bullion—for the nineteen years from 1858 to 1876 was £5,986,000,000, and that the value of all like exports for the same time was £4,793,000,000, leaving an excess of imports over exports, or an apparent adverse balance of trade against the United Kingdom for the period under consideration, of the immense sum of £1,193,000,000, or nearly $6,000,000,000 ($5,965,000,000).

Mr. McKay then goes in to specify and explain in detail the several items of charges which should be deducted from the above returned value of imports; which are, first and largest, the freight carried by British vessels in bringing the imports into the country; second, marine insurance; third, port charges—wharfage, cartage, warehouse expenses, and the like; fourth, buyers' discount; fifth, foreign bill stamps; sixth, bankers' commissions; seventh, commission and brokerage. The sum thus shown to have been paid for freights and commercial charges on imports amounts to £518,400,000; and by this amount the officially returned value of the imports, considered in the light of a charge against the Kingdom, should be properly reduced.

Mr. McKay next gives in detail the several items that should be credited to the returned value of the exports from Great Britain for the nineteen years in question and so added to their amount, which are as follows: First, freight money paid British shipowners for carrying British exports; second, insurance; third, commissions; fourth, six months' interest on goods sold for export; fifth, profits on goods exported. These several credits amount to £652,100,000, and by this sum he claims the returned value of exports is to be augmented. Now, by these charges to imports and credits to exports, aggregating £1,170,500,000 ($5,852,500,000), the apparent adverse trade balance against Great Britain from 1858 to 1876, inclusive, is brought down to the comparatively small sum of £23,000,000, or, in other words, the exports and imports of the United Kingdom, for a considerable period of recent years, are found to very nearly balance one another as commercial transactions.

This will illustrate to what an enormous extent our balance of trade is reduced by our payments to foreigners for carrying our commerce. It is, perhaps, very true that since the organization of the American shipping combine part of these large payments now remain in this country, but what fraction, however, it is impossible to state. There is no reason for believing that the entire capital of this immense combine has been transferred to this country, but, on the contrary, it is more than likely that 49 per cent of it is still held abroad, so that we are still paying $130,000,000, more or less, to foreigners.

As I said, there are two ways of applying discriminating duties: an addition of duties to existing tariff, or a rebate on existing tariff. The enemies of discriminating duties tell us that the existing treaties prevent our adopting such a measure, but as to this, I will quote what ex-Senator Edmunds said on the subject at a hearing before the subcommittee on ships and shipping of the Senate Committee on Commerce (Senate Doc. No. 149, first session Fifty-sixth Congress, p. 35):

We are thus, I think, in the attitude of being able, without any breach of treaty obligations, to resort to discriminations in respect of our vessels and commerce, after giving the requisite notices and after the lapse of time referred to.

We find, therefore, that the law empowers us to adopt such a measure if we see fit, and policy alone should dictate our action. Should we adopt such a principle, we are told that we would meet with great retaliation from foreign countries. As to this Jefferson said:

It is true that we may expect some inconvenience in practice from the establishment of discriminating duties. But in this, as in many other cases, we are left to choose between two evils.

There are two reasons for which foreign countries might be led to retaliation—either commercial or political reasons. The history of the past tells us that retaliation was ineffective and that our merchant marine flourished beyond the hopes of the founders of our discriminating system. It is difficult to see or foretell what measure discriminating duties might lead to, but the example of Russia might perhaps be taken as throwing some light upon the subject.

In the year 1900, before Russia had placed her hand with hostile intent upon our export trade, the exports from the United States to Russia amounted to $8,498,950. In the next year, 1901, during a portion of which the hostile tariff was in force, our exports into Russia amounted to $6,504,857; but in 1902, although during the whole twelve months the hostile tariff was in operation, we exported to Russia $13,414,790 of commerce, a gain of our commerce last year over 1900, under the old system, of $4,915,840, so that the Russian attack failed. We have not lost, but we have gained.

That retaliation from a commercial point of view might come if we adopt a system of adding differential duties to our already exorbitant tariff is quite possible; that we should meet with any retaliation, from a commercial point of view, from a system of rebates is quite unlikely. That we should receive it from a political point is very probable, but we should not hesitate to meet it. On this point I may quote Jefferson. He says:

Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a source of defense essential.

Manufacturers abroad are not likely to resent a reduction of our tariff, and in the nations of Europe, where they are all staggering under heavy taxes for the support of their armies and navies, it will be hard to create enthusiasm to retaliate for mere purposes of policy. Our food stuff is over 64 per cent of our exports, and if anything is to be done for the support and encouragement of our merchant marine it should be borne by those who have received and are still receiving the greatest protection of our Government.

Mr. Chairman, in advocating a measure for the development of our merchant marine, I do so all the more earnestly because, coming from the great port of New York, I represent a people who have always been anxious to encourage, foster, and protect a merchant marine, even to the extent of exempting foreign shipping from taxation, as shown by existing law. In introducing the bill that I have in the House, for the upbuilding of a merchant marine, my object was to do so without adding any additional burdens of taxes to the consumer.

The bill provides that a rebate on all duties imposed by the present tariff law shall be allowed on goods imported in vessels having American registry or hereafter built in this country and owned by American citizens. The amount of rebate is to vary from 12½ to 25 per cent, according to a designated classification of the vessels according to speed and tonnage, the faster vessels receiving the larger rebates. This classification is to be determined by a board acting under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

In order to reap the benefits of the bill, it is stipulated that at least one-third of the crews of the vessels must be American citizens, and whenever one-half of the crew are American citizens an additional 10 per cent rebate is to be granted, and all rebates are to be settled at the end of each voyage. The bill also provides that a rebate of 15 per cent shall be allowed on all tonnage dues paid by vessels of American registry. The Secretary of State is instructed to terminate all terminable treaties in conflict with the bill and to negotiate for the abrogation of other conflicting treaties, and the bill is to go into effect thirteen months after its enactment.

I have, in addition to a general encouragement of the merchant marine, made a classification according to speed and tonnage, with the intention of inviting the development of large and high-speed vessels which could be acquired by our Government if required.

Mr. Chairman, a measure based on the principles I have just suggested would avoid the evils, both theoretical and practical, of direct subsidy, and it would impose no tax, either direct or indirect, on the public. I am convinced that the American merchant marine requires Government assistance, which has at all times been given by foreign governments and by ourselves when our merchant marine was second to none. By the measure I propose this assistance is given without increasing the burdens of taxation to the consumer, but, on the contrary, placing the burden where it belongs—on the already too highly protected interests. In other words, Mr. Chairman, it obliges the high-protected interests to pay back a portion of the immense profits which accrue to them through the Dingley tariff to that branch of industry which has been so long neglected and the fostering of which is so very important to-day.

My bill tends to reduce the burden of taxation very materially. The various bills which have sought to accomplish the object in view by increasing the tariff duties on goods imported in foreign vessels are open to the objection that the burden thus imposed would fall largely upon the American purchaser and consumer of such imports. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, by the rebate system proposed in my bill the same discrimination in favor of American vessels is secured, not only without increasing the tariff burdens of the people, but in fact diminishing them.

At the same time there is this additional advantage, from the business man's point of view, that the bill makes no alteration in the existing tariff schedules or tariff law, and does not lay violent hands on the tariff system, while the rebates can obviously be borne by the Treasury without inconvenience, because our present receipts from customs duties are largely above our national revenue needs, and in the last fiscal year resulted in a surplus of nearly $100,000,000.

Of course, it would be impossible, Mr. Chairman, to make an exact statement of what American shipowners would realize from this bill if enacted, because there is no telling how many new American vessels will be built to compete under its provisions, or how large a proportion of our dutiable imports they would bring. In the early years of our national history American vessels carried an average of nearly 90 per cent of our foreign commerce. Roughly speaking, the bill would operate about as follows: Taking as a basis the $250,000,000 duties collected on dutiable goods imported last year, and assuming that the average percentage of rebate which American vessels would enjoy under the bill would be about 15 per cent of the duties on goods imported therein, we find that if American vessels should bring in only 10 per cent of the dutiable imports the rebate under the bill would amount to $3,750,000; if vessels of American registry should import 30 per cent of the total $250,000,000 of dutiable goods, the rebates would be $11,250,000; if the percentage should reach 50 per cent, the rebates allowed by the bill would amount to $18,750,000, and if the percentage of dutiable goods brought in by American ships should reach 90 per cent, the rebates allowed would amount to $33,750,000. Surely this is worth striving for, and surely it is far better than to give the shipowners $9,000,000 or $12,000,000 right out of the Treasury as a bald and naked subsidy.

And, Mr. Chairman, with this great and legitimate encouragement offered by my bill, I believe that soon after its enactment the sight long desired in this country would gladden the eyes of the people—the spectacle of a revived, prosperous, triumphant, and invincible American merchant marine.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The Committee of the Whole then proceeded to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of plate printers, at piece rates to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the rates usually paid for such work, including the wages of printers' assistants at $1.50 a day each when employed, $280,010.95, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denominations than those that may be canceled or retired, except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act "to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, in line 13, strike out "at $1.50 a day each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

Harbor of New York: Prevention of obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York City: For pay of crews and maintenance of 5 steam tugs and 3 launches, $10,000.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 31, after line 13, insert:

"ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

"For replacing the following ordnance and ordnance stores destroyed by fire at the Rock Island Arsenal, Ill., on February 11, 1903, to continue available during the fiscal year 1904, as follows:

"For infantry, cavalry, and artillery equipments, including horse equipments for cavalry, and artillery harness for field, mountain, and siege artillery, $132,722.50;

"For Gatling guns, with carriages and equipments, $20,000;

"For implements and equipments for mountain, field, and siege rifles and carriages, $102,686;

"For miscellaneous spare parts pertaining to infantry, cavalry, and horse equipments, paints, cleaning material, and similar stores, paper targets, leather, portable forges, armament chests, breech covers, paulins, etc., and the various tools and materials and supplies for issue, $625,000; in all, $880,408.50.

"For rebuilding and equipping Storehouse A at Rock Island Arsenal, which was destroyed by fire on February 11, 1903, to continue available during the fiscal year 1904, $150,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a word in explanation. A fire at the Rock Island Arsenal burned up the storehouse and destroyed a great deal of public property. An estimate was forwarded to Congress and will be found in Document No. 407. The aggregate for all of the items, except the last item, was $1,768,892.50. A hearing was given to the general Chief of Ordnance, and after a full hearing, as an appropriation for this year, or the remainder of this year, and available for the coming fiscal year, the amount specified there in the aggregate is recommended—about one-half of the amount which was estimated for. It cares liberally for the public service and works out all that was desired to be worked out under the general policy of the War Department and of Congress in having a supply of arms in reserve. The item for the storehouse was submitted by way of estimate at $185,000, but on examination reduced to $150,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DICK having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

S. 7375. An act granting an increase of pension to Alfred Woodman;

S. 6158. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories" approved March 2, 1897;

S. 5279. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to restore to public entry lands embraced in whole or in part within segregations for reservoirs;

S. 1361. An act granting an increase of pension to Lucy A. Harding; and

S. 1341. An act to amend the record of Maj. John Murphy.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

H. R. 16. An act to provide for the erection, at Washington, D. C., of bronze equestrian statues to the memory of the late Brig. Gen. Count Casimir Pulaski and Baron Steuben.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

State or Territorial Homes: For continuing aid to State or Territorial Homes for the support of disabled volunteer soldiers, in conformity with the act approved August 27, 1888, including all classes of soldiers admissible to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, on account of the fiscal year 1902, $81,355.43: Provided, That one-half of any sum or sums retained by State Homes on account of pensions received from inmates shall be deducted from the aid herein provided for.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The sundry civil appropriation bill, which passed the House last week, in a paragraph that carried the usual appropriation for the support of soldiers who are maintained in State Homes, contained the same kind of a proviso as the one in the paragraph just read. At that time I made a futile effort to have the proviso stricken out. At the time the question came up I had had no opportunity to investigate the situation with relation to State Homes. Since that time I have given the matter some study. I find that there are 27 States that maintain Soldiers' Homes, and of the 27, 21 retain some portion of the soldiers' pensions. The aggregate fund returned into the Treasury by the operation of this proviso last year amounted to $41,844.57.

Everyone in the House understands that at National Military Homes the widows and wives of soldiers are not eligible for admission, and to accommodate the desires of a great many soldiers in the country State Homes were constructed, providing for the admission of the wives and the widows of soldiers of the various wars of the Republic. The Federal Government, by an act passed in 1888, appropriated $100 a year for every soldier supported in a State Home who is eligible to admission in one of the National Homes. That law contained no limitations, qualifications, or conditions whatever, and the appropriation bills, commencing at a time I do not just know when, began to contain the proviso requiring the boards of management of the various State Homes to credit on the maintenance appropriation of $100 per capita for the members of those various Homes one-half the amounts that were withheld from the pensions of the inhabitants of State Homes. An investigation shows that at the Indiana Home, for instance, last year, there was an average attendance of 330.5, and the Federal Government received in the way of rebate last year for pensions withheld the sum of $5,012.62 from that Home, showing that $10,025.22 of the soldiers' pensions were withheld, an average of $2.52 each per month, and illustrating that the average pensions of soldiers in the State Homes is only $10.52 a month.

Now, this fund created by the withholding of this small portion of the pensions of soldiers who find shelter and support in the State Homes is money that belongs to the soldiers. They have a right to ask that it shall be expended for the promotion of their welfare and their comfort, and by this proviso and the one that is usually contained in the sundry civil appropriation bill one-half of this small fund of $2.52 a month from each soldier sheltered in a State Home is taken from those institutions and turned into the Federal Treasury, and for whose benefit? For the benefit of the soldier whose money goes to make it up? No, for the benefit of all the people of the country. I protested last week when this proposition was before the committee, and I am still protesting against it, although I do not move to strike out the proviso.

I do not believe it would be policy to do so now, since the sundry civil bill has already gone through, but I do hope that the great Committee on Appropriations, which deals so lavishly with the people's money, will, when they come to prepare another sundry civil appropriation bill, conclude that it is too small business for the Government to say that this fund, which is made up for the support and maintenance of members of State Homes and for the care and maintenance of their wives and widows, shall be taken from them, but that it shall remain there to be expended for their use and benefit. I have before me, Mr. Chairman, the reports of the various Soldiers' Homes of the country, showing, among other things, the States that maintain Homes and the amount that each State withholds from pensions and the amount that the Government takes from each State by virtue of this proviso. I do not believe that it is the policy of the Government to attempt to take from a single worthy soldier a dollar or a penny of the pension money that he receives under the laws of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that the gentleman's time will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be extended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is said that it is the policy of the Federal Government to discourage the withholding of any part of pension money from inhabitants of State Homes. This proviso in no sense discourages that practice. It is true that there is a law on the Federal statute books preventing the managers of National Military Homes from withholding any part of the pension money of their members, and it is also true that there is such a broad discretion vested in the boards of managers that they can and do, as a matter of fact, require every man who enters the portals of those institutions to sign a contract turning three-fourths of his pension money over for the support of his wife and family who remain on the outside.

Instead of doing that, the State Homes say to the soldiers who have wives, "Bring your wives here and pay to us all over the sum of $8 a month of pension that you receive and we will maintain you and your wife in comfort and ease as far as it is possible for us to do in an institution of this character." The soldiers in the State Homes receive a much greater portion of their pensions to expend for their own benefit, according to their own pleasure, than they do in National Military Homes, and the operation of this proviso has in no respect decreased by one single penny the amount of money that is withheld by the managers of State Soldiers' Homes from the pensions of their members. I beg to impress this question upon the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, in order that it may receive more thorough and careful consideration when the next bill comes up to be shaped and reported for consideration.

I withdraw the formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his formal amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian affairs.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 56, after line 15, insert:

"The necessary expenses of making the $40 per capita payment to the Chicasaws, as provided in section 72 of the Choctaw and Chicasaw agreement, ratified by the act of July 1, 1902, not to exceed $5,000, shall be paid out of the same fund from which said $40 per capita payment is authorized to be paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

By star routes, on account of the fiscal year 1902, $40,958.91.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 66 by inserting the following after line 9:

"That it shall be the duty of all mail carriers on star routes to take all mail duly stamped from the roadside boxes along the star routes and deliver it to the postmaster at the nearest postoffice along his route: Provided. That all contracts hereafter made by the Government of the United States for carrying mail on the star routes shall contain a clause carrying into effect this provision of law, and it shall not go into effect until such new contracts are made."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to make the point of order, or I will reserve it if the gentleman desires.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will explain the reason why I have offered this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will just reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The reason for this amendment is this: Several years ago Congress passed a law requiring postoffice boxes to be placed upon the roadsides of all star routes, for the purpose of delivering the mail to the individuals who paid for and put up the boxes. Under the ruling of the Postmaster-General the mail carrier takes the mail from the nearest postoffice and deposits it in the box for the owner of the box, but the Postmaster-General rules that the law does not permit the carrier to take the mail out of the box and mail it at the nearest postoffice.

There is no reason why a man owning a roadside box should not be permitted to deposit his mail in that box and have it taken from the box by the star-route carrier, to be carried by him to the nearest post-office along the route, to be there mailed by him. This amendment provides that all subsequent contracts entered into shall have a clause requiring this to be done. It is true that this would be a hardship upon the contractors if this amendment should go into effect at present, because it would require every box along the road to be unlocked to ascertain whether any mail was therein, whereas at present the star-route carrier, unless he has mail to deposit in a particular box, does not stop at that box. Stopping at a box would only delay the carrier probably from one to three minutes. He would simply have to stop his horse and unlock each letter box to see whether there was any mail there, and if so to take it out and carry it to the nearest post-office. At the present time the carriers deliver the mail in the boxes, but there is nothing requiring them to take the mail from the boxes and deliver it to the nearest post-office along the route, but this ruling of the Post-Office Department prohibits the carrier from taking mail from boxes and delivering it at the nearest office along his route.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman if the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have considered this?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The bill has been before that committee but a very short time. The fact is I did not know that this state of affairs existed until very recently. Numerous postmasters and individuals in my district have informed me that they have been in correspondence with the Postmaster-General on the subject, and he states that such is the fact, that the star-route carriers have been instructed to deliver the mail in the boxes, but not to take it out of the boxes.

Mr. CANNON. On the gentleman's statement of the trouble the proposed legislation looks as though it has much merit, but I dislike very much to gather up on a bill that is wholly foreign to the subject matter touching the postal service.

I think the Post-Office appropriation bill is still pending in the Senate. Possibly when it comes, by way of agreeing to a Senate amendment with an amendment, the gentleman can work out what he desires; and then the committee thoroughly familiar with it will have it in conference. I will say to the gentleman that this bill is almost the last one to pass, and it goes through with lightning speed in conference, and I would a little prefer, unless the gentleman is very decidedly insistent, to see if he can not work it out upon the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am perfectly aware that the amendment is subject to the point of order; but I would like very much to see it enacted into law.

Mr. CANNON. I think I have very great sympathy with the gentleman's purpose, but it seems to me the safer way would be to see if the gentleman can not work it out on the Post-Office bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

That under, and to be paid from, the appropriation of $500,000 for the enforcement of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory therof or supplemental thereto, and other acts mentioned in said appropriation, made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1904, the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an assistant to the Attorney-General with compensation at the rate of $7,000 per annum and an Assistant Attorney-General at a compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum; and the Attorney-General is authorized to appoint and employ, without reference to the rules and regulations of the civil service, two confidential clerks at a compensation at the rate of $1,600 each per annum, to be paid from said appropriation. Said assistant to the Attorney-General and Assistant Attorney-General shall peform such duties as may be required of them by the Attorney-General.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph beginning with line 24, on page 66, down to and including line 18, on page 67. I do it for the double purpose of having a ruling of the Chair, and, further, to know from the distinguished chairman what is the necessity for changing the existing statutes?

Mr. CANNON. In the first place, I do not believe it is subject to the point of order all along the line. But I think the gentleman, on an explanation, even if it was, would not insist upon the point of order.

The gentleman will recollect that on the legislative and executive enactment there was appropriated $500,000 for the enforcement of the interstate-commerce legislation and the antitrust legislation, and all acts amendatory and supplemental thereto, which had its inception in an amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], that was amended by the Senate and broadened.

Now, just before the reporting of this bill there came an estimate from the Department of Justice, properly transmitted, asking that a provision be made for some employees in the Department of Justice in the District of Columbia. This $500,000 would be available for every place in the United States for these or kindred employees where necessary in the discretion of the Attorney-General in the enforcement of the law specified. But there is a statute, a general law, enacted twenty years ago, that no employee, clerk, etc., should be employed in the District of Columbia unless especially authorized. Now, in view of that fact, and in view of the great increase of business that is evident to everybody must come from the legislation lately enacted—the expedition legislation, the so-called Elkins bill legislation, and the legislation under the Department of Commerce, the two former especially, he asked that these additional officials in the District of Columbia be appropriated for, and we make them payable from the $500,000, which is appropriated in the legislative and executive law, that has already been passed. Is there any other question the gentleman wants to ask?

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. CANNON. I beg your pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CANNON. A little later on. One word. Does the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman why it is necessary to change the law in reference to the civil service and make this provision:

And the Attorney-General is authorized to appoint and employ without reference to the rules and regulations of the civil service, two confidential clerks at a compensation,

And so on? Why is it that they shall be appointed without reference to the rules and regulations of the civil service?

Mr. CANNON. This is as to the two confidential clerks.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is in reference to the two clerks who are to receive a part of this money. Now, does the gentleman mean to say that, after we have gone to the great expense of having these civil-service rules and regulations laid down and examinations made, there can not be found upon the eligible list of the country two men who are eligible to be certified to the Attorney-General's Office—men who are competent to discharge the duties, no matter how confidential they may be, how onerous they may be, or how skillful the men may have to be about this trust business? I believe we have had the civil-service law since 1883. It has gone on and become a factor in the administration of our Government. These examinations are held twice a year, and people from all over the country are invited to take them. Ought we not to abolish this system of civil service or allow it to stay as it is; and if we do, is there any good reason why we can not find two clerks competent enough now on the eligible rolls to perform this service?

Mr. CANNON. In answer to the gentleman's question, I want to say the civil service, the classified service, under legislation of Congress, is here. It is not necessary for me to bless it or to curse it. It is here, and for the present it is going to stay, for if we do not like it or approve it, we have not the courage to repeal it. Now, already there are exceptions made in certain cases. The head of a department, the Assistant Secretary, the chief of a bureau, is entitled to a confidential clerk, to be chosen by himself, or by themselves, without regard to civil-service law. Now, then, the two officials provided for here, one at $7,000 and one at $5,000 a year, lawyers, high-grade officials, with a high grade of duty to perform, equal to that of any assistant to the Attorney-General, and probably equal to that of the Solicitor-General, ought to have, if they exist at all, confidential clerks; and it was to give them, respectively, each a confidential clerk that this provision was placed in the law.

Now, then, my friend says, why not resort to the machinery of the civil service? For the same reason that we do not resort to the machinery of the civil-service law when you enable the head of a bureau to choose one confidential clerk. If I was charged with important duties, the privilege of choosing somebody in whose skill and interest and ability and fidelity to the work, and to myself personally, I would be in a much better condition than I would to put a nickel in the slot and draw somebody from Maine or somebody from Montana that happened to pass a pro forma examination after a month, perhaps, of coaching by professional coachers. In other words, this civil-service law in places works such a hardship that Congress has let up on it, and it has let up on it touching one confidential clerk to each man that is the head of a bureau, or the head of a department, or one of the assistant secretaries.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, in the first place the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken in supposing that this law is a limitation on the expenditure of $500,000 that is heretofore proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. CANNON. It is payable from it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is very true; but it has not been passed yet.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has not been signed by the President.

Mr. CANNON. I understand it has.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was told a few minutes ago that it had not been signed by the President. But, whether it has or not, it does not make a particle of difference. I would be glad, I think, in view of the condition of the country, if appropriations of this character could be made. I would take the legislative appropriation bill, in so far as it relates to clerks, and I think it would be a great improvement to just pass one round lump of money to be appropriated for the clerical hire of the various departments of the Government, and then, under the head of limitation upon the expenditure of it, provide how the clerks should be appointed.

That is the operation here. They appropriate $500,000 for a specific purpose, and then in another and subsequent enactment that may never become a law they undertake to say how that money shall be expended—not the money in this bill, but the money heretofore or hereafter appropriated.

But there is a complete change of existing law in this paragraph, and there is enough of that character to carry with it the whole of the paragraph. Now, in the first place, my objection to this paragraph is, that it is unfair and makes a discrimination that is unwise and unjust for the Attorney-General to be permitted to increase the salary of an Assistant Attorney-General from $5,000 to $7,000.

Mr. CANNON. It is not done for that purpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the effect of it. What better right has the Assistant Attorney-General to have his salary increased than Mr. Tyner, and a long list of the men that are serving here in the Department, men of great skill? Take the one in the Land Office Department of the Government. He was serving at $5,000 a year, a man of great ability, so much so that the President, as I understand it, has appointed him to a high judicial position, and yet he served in that Department ever since the McKinley Administration began at $5,000 a year. Why should Mr. Knox—who has just shifted one of his friends into a position of $8,000 a year—why should he come now with an additional seven-thousand-dollar man, $2,000 above the same grade that the others are having throughout the entire system, and then take a second one and give him $5,000 a year, while the same grade of assistant attorneys are getting three thousand five hundred and four thousand in the various departments of the Government?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Let me ask the gentleman, would it not be a good reason for that that the assistant who is going to have charge of the antitrust legislation will come in competition with the very best lawyers in the whole country, much more so than the others?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is no answer to it. The ablest lawyers in the country appear for the railroads, and they have been appearing for the railroads during all these years, and yet this is the first time we have ever had to increase the salary of an Assistant Attorney-General. Ever since this interstate-commerce law was passed the Attorney-General of the United States, through his assistants, has been battling in the courts. The great trust questions that have been fought out in a large part by the ability of Mr. Richards, the Solicitor-General, have all been fought out under the law as it now exists. What is there in the immediate future that justifies this system? But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the point I rose to make.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman from Ohio think that if we have not in the last twenty years been able to educate clerks up to the standard that it is about time to get rid of the civil-service law?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Georgia will please not break in on my remarks. I recollect that I repeated to him some time ago what the gentleman has just said. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Illinois has made the most terrific attack on the civil-service law that I ever heard made on the floor. He calls it a "nickel in the slot." [Laughter.]

Hereafter I shall use that term generally when I speak of the civil-service law. For twenty years this law has been in force in the United States. For twenty years these academic examinations have been going on. For twenty years these young men have been coming into Washington and going into various departments, lawyers, law students, and all sorts of people, and here at this late day, at the end of twenty years of time, the Department comes forward and says in all the thousands of young men and older men in the service of the Government there can not be found two men fit to be private secretaries and confidential secretaries to two such tremendous men as we are going to hurl at the trusts of the country. [Laughter.]

What a commentary upon that law. The gentleman from Illinois can go to his district, and I can go to mine; and he can nominate, and I can nominate, without any trouble a dozen men capable of filling those places; but if we undertake to do it, they would say we were "corruptionists"—opposed to the merit system—not in favor of promotion of a man upon his merits. And now they want the Attorney-General to turn his gigantic intellect on an examination and try to find some merit—somewhere in Pennsylvania, of course—to fill up those places. [Laughter.]

I am opposed to it. It is a discrimination. It is an attack upon the law. If they were content not to discriminate against other Assistant Attorneys-General, and had put these salaries at figures which others are getting, and had left out the provision for these two clerks, I would not have said a word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will consent to an amendment to strike out the clause beginning in line 7, at the word "and," and extending to the word "appropriation" in line 15, I will compromise on the matter, and will cauterize my conscience [laughter] by allowing the two great lawyers to come in, and just get out these two clerks—put where they will not be a reflection upon the civil-service law. Otherwise, I shall have to insist on my point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I should like the Clerk to read a letter from the Attorney-General, and after the reading I wish to say a word. Then I shall be ready for the ruling of the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1903.

Hon. JOHN J. JENKINS,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to the proposition to appropriate the sum of $500,000 to be expended by the Attorney-General in the enforcement of the antitrust laws, I take this opportunity of saying that in my judgment more effective work at much less cost to the Government can be done if the permanent force of the Department of Justice is reasonably increased. The greatest desideratum is that a new officer should be provided for who might appropriately be called the "assistant to the Attorney-General," to whom the Attorney-General could delegate the performance of many of the duties resting upon him. The necessity for such assistance exists wholly outside of any additional labor that it may be contemplated the Department will be compelled to undertake by reason of the proposed appropriation.

The creation of such an office and an additional attorney-generalship would enable the Department within itself to look after many of the cases that otherwise would be placed in the hands of special counsel whose services are not obtainable upon the basis of compensation allowed by the Government for its permanent legal services.

If such provision should be made covering the additional clerical assistance necessary, a very much less appropriation for special services than that proposed would be ample to cover any requirements of the immediate future.

Respectfully, yours,

P. C. KNOX, Attorney-General.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say frankly that I think this provision is subject to a point of order, but in view of legislation that has been had, and in view of the litigation that is in front of this Department, I do not think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] really desires to make the point of order upon the Assistant Attorney-General at $7,000 and the Assistant Attorney-General at $5,000.

As to the two clerks, I really think my friend from Ohio and I shall not quarrel as to the fact that the Department will get two better confidential clerks, at $1,600 each, if they be selected in the manner proposed here, than if resort were had to the civil-service machinery. I do not really believe the gentleman is in earnest about his point of order. However, if he wishes to make it upon these two confidential clerks, but not upon the two Assistant Attorneys-General, both of these positions being new offices, I must perforce be content.

Just one word further. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], whose intellectual power and great industry I acknowledge, came in on the legislative bill, without clapping his wings—although he always can clap his wings when he wants to—and offered the amendment, which was well advertised throughout the country and properly so, to appropriate $500,000 to enforce—what? The antitrust law. That proposition has been amended to apply to the interstate-commerce law, and also to apply to all acts supplemental or amendatory to both these laws.

Now we are coming down to the actual operation of getting ready to enforce those laws; and the gentleman, merely that he may have his criticism upon the civil service, about which I will not quarrel with him—it is not necessary to do so—is seemingly in harmony with striking out the provision for these two additional officers.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman unintentionally misrepresents me. I have not made a word of inquiry with reference to these additional law officers; I confined my inquiry to the two clerks.

Mr. CANNON. The two confidential clerks?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; then I will withdraw my remark, and I feel assured that my friend, in view of his great desire—with which I sympathize—to have the laws enforced, will not make a point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not made any point of order. The gentleman misunderstands. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman never understood me to make any point of order against this.

Mr. CANNON. I have not. I said I trusted that he would not.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman need not have any fears about it. I will not.

Mr. CANNON. I am delighted to hear it. Now I have got the gentleman where I want him, I will clinch it right there.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is not necessary to clinch me about anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I think I shall escape the point of order directly, because, really, I am under the impression the proposed law or appropriation should stand, and I will ask my friend from Ohio if he still feels like insisting on his point of order?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want five minutes' time.

Mr. CANNON. It is subject to the point of order. I am not contesting that fact.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want about five minutes to explain my position.

Mr. CANNON. Well, there is nobody that I will listen to with such pleasure, whether he explains it at my expense or at the expense of anyone else.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, some time ago, I do not remember exactly when, I had something to say here on the subject of trusts. It was not a prepared speech, but it was a mere incident of some discussion which was going on on the floor of the House. In that speech I said that there was no necessity for any legislation on the subject of trusts in the United States, except such legislation as might be necessary to promote and push forward the prosecutions under the Sherman Act. I took occasion to say at the time that in my judgment the Sherman Act was as perfect, for the purposes for which it was brought into existence, as the genius of man could put into legal form with the English language.

I have been two or three times delighted to hear myself assailed on the other side of the House for those remarks, and the gentleman from Missouri, whom I do not now see in his seat, I accidentally heard was engaged in shelling my position and shelling the woods over my head because of that comment. I said then and I believed then what I have said everywhere, on the stump, in the press, and everywhere else, that as a foundation defining the purposes of legislation against unlawful combination of capital, the achievement of the Sherman law was complete and perfect. Since I made those remarks two events, as we might class them, have happened. One was the passage by the Congress of the United States and the approval by the President of three great measures.

The first aimed to ascertain the facts that might all have been ascertained under the Sherman law, but it has been put in better form and handed over to a department or a bureau. The second was to prevent delay in prosecutions, so that when the Attorney-General saw fit to attack a combination we could have a speedy settlement of the question in the highest courts of the country. That has been enacted. The third was a further definition of the term "rebates." All of these are mere supplements to the Sherman law. All of them, foundation and branches, are the work of Republican statesmanship.

Since that speech was made, one of the judges of the United States court at Chicago has delivered an opinion, which I will ask permission to include in my remarks by way of extension, so that I need not occupy too much of the time of the House. He has discussed in a most able and conclusive manner two propositions, both of which are underlying principles of the Sherman Act. First, what is interstate commerce, and, second, what is an unlawful combination, and where does it begin? That has been the great trouble, and a great many of our friends have been introducing bills to try and define where the law would first strike. This very able judge in a most clear and conclusive decision has held that the place where the beef trust begins to violate the law is when it goes out upon the plains, down in Texas, and elsewhere, and commences to buy the cattle that are afterwards slaughtered in Chicago and sold in Washington; and that every step of the way, from the conspiracy to lower the price of the cattle down to the conspiracy in the retail dealers to enhance the price of the product, is all in violation of the Sherman law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, coming to the point of order. We have appropriated, or are about to appropriate, $500,000 to enforce this law. I believe that future Congresses will be more inclined to extract some of the drastic characteristics from these enactments than that we shall ever be called upon to go further with this sort of legislation. Therefore I can not stand in the way of a full and complete prosecution under this law, and if the civil-service law—"the nickel-in-the-slot law," as the gentleman from Illinois calls it, and it has got pretty low now; clear down to a nickel—in my judgment, I would make it one of these penny fellows—if it is so that we can not enforce the law of the country, because the clerical forces of the country under this law are not fit for the uses they were destined for. I will not stand in the way of any reasonable appropriation. I do not believe this $7.000 man ought to have been provided, but under the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I do firmly believe that there is an absolute necessity to go outside of the civil-service law for competent clerks.

I withdraw the point of order, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws the point of order and asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BEEF-TRUST DECREE—AN INJUNCTION IS GRANTED BY JUDGE GROSSCUP—APPEAL MAY BE TAKEN—COMBINE HELD TO BE IN VIOLATION OF THE SHERMAN LAW—METHODS OF PACKERS DISCUSSED AT LENGTH IN THE DECISION—MEANING OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE DEFINED—COURT HOLDS THAT AGREEMENTS AS TO BIDDING AND SHIPMENTS PROVE A CASE OF COMBINATION—GIVEN FOURTEEN DAYS TO FILE ANSWER.

CHICAGO, February 18, 1903.

The so-called "beef trust" case was disposed of to-day by Judge Grosscup in the United States circuit court, the demurrer of the packers being overruled and a temporary injunction granted. The attorneys for the packers made no announcement of their intentions. They have until March 4 to discuss the matter with their principals. If they deny the facts upon which Judge Grosscup based his decision, the matter will go before a master in chancery, who will hear the evidence, and the case will again be argued before Judge Grosscup. An appeal may be taken, in order to hasten the final adjudication of the case. It is not believed likely that the packers will let the matter go by default, thus making the injunction permanent.

"Commerce," said Judge Grosscup in his decision, "is the sale or exchange of commodities. But that which the law looks upon as the body of commerce is not restricted to specific acts of sale or exchange. It includes the intercourse, all the initiatory and intervening acts, instrumentalities, and dealings which directly bring about the sale or exchange. Thus, though the sale or exchange is a commercial act, so also is the solicitation of the drummer, whose occupation it is to bring about the sale or exchange. The whole transaction, from initiation to culmination is commerce.

COMMERCE BETWEEN THE STATES.

"When commerce, thus broadly defined, is between parties dealing from different States, to be effected so far as the immediate act of exchange goes, both transportation from State to State, it is commerce between the States within the meaning of the Constitution and the statute known as the Sherman Act. But it is not the transportation that makes the transaction interstate commerce. That is an adjunct only essential to commerce, but not the test. The underlying test is that the transaction, as an entirety, including each part calculated to bring about the result, reaches into two or more States, and that the parties dealing with reference thereto deal from different States. An interstate commercial transaction is, in this sense, an affair arising from different States, and centering from the act of exchange express essential part of the affair being as much commerce as is the center. With this definition in mind, let us see what the transaction made out in the petition is.

"For the purpose of clear exposition, the facts set forth in the petition should be separated into two groups—those that are intended to bring the transaction within the body of interstate commerce, and those that are intended to fix upon such transaction the character of unlawful combination and conspiracy. The first group may be stated as follows: The defendants, controlling 60 per cent of the trade and commerce in fresh meats in the United States, buy in the course of their business live stock, shipped from points throughout the United States, which, having been converted into fresh meats, is sold again by them at the places where prepared to dealers and consumers in other States, or is sold through their agents, located in other States, to dealers and consumers in the States where the agents are located.

THE QUESTION OF SHIPMENTS.

"The shipments in the first class of sales are made directly from the places where the meat is prepared to the dealers and consumers in other States, and in the latter class to the agents in the other States, who upon sale deliver directly to the dealer and consumer.

"What may be called the body of these transactions is twofold. It reaches backward to the purchase of cattle that come to defendants from States other than those in which defendants manufacture; and it reaches forward to the sale of the meats after conversion to parties dealing with respect thereto from other States, followed by shipments into other States. Each of these transactions constitutes, in my judgment, interstate commerce.

"Coming to the other branch of the transactions, the sales by defendant, a like result follows. Unquestionably it is commerce when purchasers from other States buy directly from the defendants and have the meats shipped to them by the venders. The status of such a transaction, both as to initiatory intercourse and as to transportation in furtherance of the exchange, includes a State other than the one from which the defendants deal.

"I think the same is true of meats sent to agents and sold from their stores. The transaction in such cases, in reality, is between the purchaser and the agents' principal. The agents represent the principal at the place where the exchange takes place, but the transaction as a commercial entity includes the principal and includes him as dealing from his place of business. Indeed, such privity exists between the principal and transaction that could, at the instant, as a citizen of another State, sue upon the transaction in the Federal courts; nor have I any question that if the conditions of this case were reversed, so that the defendants were invoking the shelter instead of seeking to escape the obligations of the commerce clause, Federal law would be found equal to the protection asked.

SUBJECT TO STATE TAXATION.

"Because a thing can be taxed by the State, it does not follow that it lies outside the body of interstate commerce, for commerce, interstate as well as domestic, is subject to the police and taxing power of the State, so long as the exercise of such power does not interfere with the National Government's exclusive right of regulation.

"Do the facts set forth in the second grouping fix upon the transaction, even though the transactions be within the body of interstate commerce, the character of unlawful combination? The averments are as follows: That the defendants are engaged in an unlawful combination and conspiracy under the Sherman Act in (A) directing and requiring their purchasing agents at the markets where the live stock was customarily purchased to refrain from bidding against each other when making such purchases; (B) in bidding up through their agents the price of live stock for a few days at a time to induce large shipments and then ceasing from bids to obtain the live stock thus shipped at prices much less than it would bring in the regular way; (C) in agreeing at meetings between them upon prices to be adopted by all and restriction upon the quantities of meat shipped; (D) in directing and requiring their agents throughout the United States to impose uniform charges for cartage for delivery, thereby increasing to dealers and consumers the charges for such meats, and (E) in making agreements with the transportation companies for rebates and other discriminative rates.

"No one can doubt that these averments state a case of combination. Whether the combination be unlawful or not depends on whether it is in restraint of the trade.

GENERAL MEANING OF THE TERM.

"The general meaning of that term is no longer open to inquiry. It has been passed upon carefully by the Supreme Court in the freight association case and in the traffic case. It is clear from them that restraint of trade is not dependent upon any consideration of reasonableness or unreasonableness in the combination averred, nor is it to be tested by the prices that result from the combination. Indeed, combination that leads directly to lower prices to the consumer may, within the doctrine of these cases, even as against the consumer, be restraint of trade, and combination that leads directly to higher prices may, as against the producer, be restraint of trade. The statute thus interpreted has no concern with prices, but looks solely to competition and to giving competition full play, by making illegal any effort at restriction upon competition. Whatever combination has the direct and necessary effect of restricting competition is, within the meaning of the Sherman Act as now interpreted, restraint of trade.

"Thus defined, there can be no doubt that the agreement of the defendants to refrain from bidding against each other in the purchase of cattle is combination in restraint of trade; so, also, their agreement to bid up prices to stimulate shipments, intending to cease from bidding when the shipments have arrived. The same result follows when we turn to the combination of defendants to fix prices upon and restrict the quantities of meat shipped to their agents or their consumers. Such agreements can be nothing less than restrictions upon competition, and therefore combination in restraint of trade; and thus viewed, the petition, as an entirety, makes out a case under the Sherman Act.

BESET WITH DIFFICULTIES.

"It may be true that the way of enforcing any decree under this petition is beset with difficulties, and that a literal enforcement may result in vexatious interference with defendants' affairs. But in the inquiry before me I am not at liberty to stop before such considerations. The Sherman Act, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, is the law of the land, and to the law as it stands both court and people must yield obedience.

"The demurrer is overruled, and the motion for preliminary injunction granted."

The defendants against whom the injunction is issued are: Swift & Co., Cudahy Packing Company, Hammond Packing Company, Armour & Co., Armour Packing Company, G. H. Hammond Company, Schwarzschild & Sulzburger Company, Nelson Morris & Co. (partners), J. Ogden Armour, P. A. Valentine, Calvin M. Favorite, Arthur Meeker, Thomas J. Connors, Charles S. Langdon, Michael Cudahy, Edward A. Cudahy, Patrick Cudahy, Albert E. Boscherdt, Gustavus F. Swift, Lewis F. Swift, Lawrence A. Carton, D. Edwin Hartwell, Jesse P. Lyman, Frank B. Vogel, Louis Pfaelzer, William J. Russell, Albert H. Veeder, Henry Veeder, Edward C. Swift, Ferdinand Sulzburger, and W. H. Noyes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move to strike out the last word. I will detain the committee but a moment.

We all remember that when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was under consideration by the House an amendment was offered by myself making provision for the prosecution of violators of what is known as the antitrust law and the interstate-commerce law and the amendments thereto. We all remember also that the gentleman who had that bill in charge was about to make the point of order upon that amendment, and with what alacrity the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] suggested to him from the rear that it should not be done. Now, the gentleman from Illinois suggested that I could make the point of order against this provision, the wish probably being father to the suggestion.

Now, I know the rules of the House, and they are generally wise. The provision of the rule that no legislation shall be put upon a general appropriation bill is a wise provision, but the subject now under consideration seems to be so near to the hearts of everybody, that the Department of Justice shall have ample means to carry out both the existing law, known as the Sherman antitrust law, and the amendments to it, as well as the sham laws that we have passed at this present session of Congress, and it is so important that the Department of Justice should have the money necessary to prosecute the trusts in order to relieve the people from the exactions of the trusts, that we can all afford to let this proposition pass without making a point of order against it. For myself, I believe that whenever the rules of the House which are made for ordinary cases are found to stand in the way of giving relief to the people, if we can get that relief in no other way except by legislation upon appropriation bills, that the House ought to waive the point of order and put the legislation upon the appropriation bill, the safety of the people being the supreme law. That is all I desire to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in speaking to his point of order, said what he has frequently said before—that the Sherman antitrust law contains ample remedies for the redress of all the grievances of the public against monopolies and combinations. I believe that statement to be true. I believe the Sherman antitrust law, faithfully and impartially enforced, would have prevented the formation of monopolies, and that throughout all the years it has been ignored by those in power its enforcement could have been easily accomplished.

Would it be possible to bring against the Republican party an indictment more severe than the statement he has made? This law, so ample, so complete, has remained a dead letter upon the statute book from the day of its enactment. No Federal court and no Attorney-General has made a consistent effort to enforce it. Meantime it is notorious that it has been violated over and over again, not secretly, but with no effort at concealment.

But that is not all. The public prosecutor has not even thought of enforcing it! At this late day, after combinations have seized the coal mines, the forests, the lake shipping, the railroads, the oil fields, and nearly all the natural resources of a continent, the Attorney-General has suddenly awakened to the fact that Congress has never provided the Law Department with funds with which to carry this law into execution.

What has kept the Attorney-General silent about the necessity of this appropriation all these years? Why has not Congress been told heretofore that it ought to make provision for the enforcement of this statute? Who is blamable for this negligence? I recall the fact that only a little while ago the President of the United States intimated that every enginery of the law would be brought to bear to punish the projectors of the railroad combination known as the great merger. Forthwith it was announced by the New York papers that this had grievously offended his excellency J. Pierpont Morgan; that J. Pierpont Morgan and his associates were astonished that any law should be invoked to curtail the operations of the captains of industry. Through the New York papers, the trust magnates complained bitterly that a law that had been treated universally as a dead letter from the day of its enactment was about to be treated as a part of the law of the land.

A fine record this, for a great party in charge of the Government and all its branches, with the Attorney-General and the enginery of the courts at its disposal, armed with everything necessary, including what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says is an ample provision of laws, against trusts and combinations, and yet combination after combination is formed, trust after trust is created, monopoly after monopoly is brought into existence, and never a finger lifted to prevent it or punish the offenders. And what has been the attitude of Republican lawmakers and Republican leaders toward these great trusts and combinations? Have they demanded the enforcement of this very excellent statute? If not, why? The answer is not doubtful. At recurring Congressional and Presidential elections they have gone to these trusts and combinations and obtained the funds with which to buy the right to sit here and in higher places and make and then ignore these laws.

No Democrat will ever arraign the Republican party in severer terms than are used when Republicans arise in this Chamber and say that for nearly a score of years we have had a law ample to prevent the formation of combinations and ample for their punishment, and then admit that no provision has ever been made for its enforcement. Now, for the first time, the Attorney-General asks for money with which to enforce it. He wants clerks and confidential agents, and higher-priced assistants, to bring these law breakers to the bar of justice. It was a true statement of the law the gentleman from Ohio made. He was right in saying that the statute is ample, and history will record that with this good law on the statute book for years and years, during which billion-dollar trusts were publicly established, and yet his party did nothing to enforce it. Mr. Chairman, his party has been in partnership with the trusts from the beginning. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries and expenses of clerks, deputy clerks, commissioners, and constables, and expenses of judges in the Indian Territory, being a deficiency on account of the fiscal year 1902, $989.10.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 67, line 23, insert:

"To pay the unpaid salary of the four presiding justices of the supreme and district courts of the Territory of Arizona for the year of 1902, the sum of $1,200 each, making in all the sum of $4,800."

Mr. CANNON. I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, the condition of the district courts in the Territory of Arizona is about this: The law provides a salary of $3,600, I think. I think they only pay to these judges $2,400 a year, or probably $3,000. If I am wrong, the clerk or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can correct me.

Mr. CANNON. The clerk says $3,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then my amendment is wrong to that extent. It should be $600 each instead of $1,200, the purpose of it being to pay to these judges the unpaid balance of the salary as provided by law. They have a salary then, taking the statement of the clerk to be true, of $3,000 a year. They are paid only $2,400 a year. The judges that Congress have provided for in Porto Rico, or commissioners anywhere that exercise even quasi-judicial functions, are paid as much as are the judges of the district courts of the United States, while these judges are paid less than the act of Congress prescribes that they shall have.

The Government owes that money, and has owed it for years. The counties of the Territory have to come to the rescue of these district judges by making compensation in the shape of mileage and expenses in order to hold the court in the different counties of the Territory, and the Government insists on paying the miserable sum of $2,400, while it should pay to them the salary that is paid to the judges in all the districts, and that is the sum of $5,000. They are not only the presiding judges of the supreme court, but they are judges also of the nisi prius or district courts. Of course, the four do not sit in judgment on appeal in all the cases tried below, but in fact they virtually do. They should be paid. They have large districts and are very much overworked men. It is as little as Congress can possibly do to allow them what Congress says itself should be paid.

Now the appropriation bill does not provide for the salary these judges are entitled to under the law, and I think the chairman of the committee will see that his point of order on this amendment is not well taken. I can only call the attention of the committee to the fact that the law prescribes the salary of these judges, and that the committee refuses to pay them and has continued to refuse every year, and this motion is constantly made by some one who recognizes the difficulties under which these men labor. They ought to have this money. They are entitled to it under the law of Congress, and I trust that the chairman of the committee will not resist a claim which is so perfectly just.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in support of the point of order, the history of the appropriation for these judges and other Territorial judges is as follows: The Revised Statutes, in the revision made in 1874, did provide a salary of $3,600. That statute has never been formally repealed. In 1875–76, when our Democratic friends had full power in the House and Senate, if I recollect aright, certainly in the House, and under the leadership of the late Mr. Randall, there was a wonderful cutting in the appropriations. The same law was in force then as is now in force, a general law; and the cut in these salaries was made from $3,600 to $3,000 at that time. There it is yet. Now, then, it will be seen, if the gentleman is correct, each one of these judges, holding office for all that long time, can go to the Court of Claims and recover. It will be quite in order to pay them in an item on the deficiency appropriation bill. Remember, first, that this class of legislation is upon the annual appropriation bills. Officers did go to the Court of Claims and did not recover, for the reason that I will give to the Chair. It is as follows:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, 1903, 1902, or whatever it may be.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the gentleman from Illinois think that the title to a bill forecloses a man's right to get his salary?

Mr. CANNON. I will read further, and this appears in all the bills:

All laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Now, this whole question has been determined in the courts. The courts hold that for the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made it changes the law, and therefore there is no law that authorizes this deficiency appropriation to pay $600 or $1,200, or whatever it is, on the ground of the services for the current year, or last year, or any other year since 1876. I will confess that while the gentleman was so kind as to criticise the Committee on Appropriations we followed afar off the example that was set by my friend's House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois send to the desk the document from which he has been reading?

Mr. CANNON. I was reading, Mr. Chairman, from the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; the first clause and the last clause in the bill have been in all the acts since 1876.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will suggest that the history of the Appropriations Committee since the death of Mr. Randall has not always preserved that same economy, except in the Territories of the United States. The mere fact that Congress passes a general appropriation bill saying that it "should be in full of all claims" does not relieve the moral aspect of the situation. It is no less robbery. These judges are no less entitled to their full pay. The language to which the chairman appeals was put on the former appropriation bill in contravention of the rules which he so often invokes. Besides, he refers to a deficiency bill.

Mr. CANNON. No; I refer to the annual appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am speaking of the deficiency, from which the gentleman read.

Mr. CANNON. I did not read from the deficiency bill; I read from the legislative bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, that makes a difference; but it strikes me that a salary that has been provided by law for a justice of the supreme court of Arizona, whose traveling expenses are twice as great as any judge in the States, ought to be paid. The distance that he has to go is twice as great, and every expense attending it is twice as large. He has larger cases to try, involving more money and requiring more talent than any other court in the country, requiring the very best lawyers in the country to preside with justice over these tribunals. And here this great Appropriation Committee sees fit to say that this shall be in full of all salaries, and puts a man in the situation that he can not get what the law gives him because the little that they allow is tied to a provision that the sum received shall be in full of salary, and forclose, or undertake to foreclose, his right to have what the general law provides.

I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his point of order. The Appropriation Committee have given twice the salary to judges who have less to do in the Philippine Islands. They have given more than that salary, yes, twice it, to judges in Hawaii, who attend to less than one-half the business that these judges do. You have given a larger salary to judges whose courts have been established since that time, and they have allowed the salaries without cutting them down. The judges in New Mexico are in exactly the same attitude. They get $3,000 a year, which is insufficient, and the committee force the Territory to pay the United States district judges. They are now forcing the people of the Territories to go into their pockets to pay the United States district judges for services, and the people have to do it in order to get the judges to attend the courts in the different counties to hear Territorial causes.

And yet the chairman of the Appropriations Committee will insist on the point of order in a case where he must know that these people are entitled to more than $3,000 for that sort of service. Their districts are as big as some States, some as large as New England, and they hold court in county after county. They hold sessions of the supreme court two or three times a year. And yet the gentleman holds them down to this pitiable salary on a point of order. When the offices were created they were given that amount of salary. In Hawaii and in the Philippine Islands the judges, every one, get more than twice this salary, while the judges in these Territories do more work than they do there. I hope the chairman of the committee, in his graciousness, at least, will see the necessity of allowing this amendment to be adopted, and not compel the overburdened taxpayers to make up the salary that Congress allows to judges appointed by the President. Sirs, it is unjust, and the point of order ought not to be pressed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the Appropriations Committee does not legislate; Congress legislates. This has been legislation for a generation.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Chairman, I just this moment entered the Chamber and do not know whether the gentleman from Arizona has so worded his amendment, if that is what it is, as to include New Mexico; but I corroborate every word he stated since I have been listening in reference to the payment of the judiciary in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. They are the worst paid men in the employ of the Government. They have districts almost as large as New York; they not only hold the courts provided by national law, but our own legislature provides for their holding additional courts in other counties. They go there; and we have to give them additional pay. At the first session of this Congress two additional judges in Oklahoma were provided for; and the salaries of all the judges in Oklahoma were increased to $4,000. I then tried to amend the bill so as to include our judges, but lost on a point of order; so I would like to get this bill amended. When the Territory of Hawaii was created provision was made for a salary of $5,000 for the district judges; and they were allowed perquisites, making their pay really equivalent to $7,500 a year, although their work in a small jurisdiction like that can not compare with the work of the Territorial judges in New Mexico and Arizona.

I submit that if it is possible to get this amendment in at this point it should be agreed to. I sincerely hope that action expected within the next few days will render those Territories independent in these matters of the National Government, so that Congress will have nothing to pay in the way of judicial salaries in New Mexico and Arizona, except for United States circuit and district judges. If that is not to happen (I refer to our admission as a State), then I hope this amendment will be agreed to, and in any event it can do no harm to pay these judges a little additional salary while we remain a Territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The theory of the gentleman from New Mexico is that the law authorizes the payment to these judges as their annual salary the sum of $3,600; that this amount is the amount of their salary as fixed by law; and that therefore his amendment proposes to provide for the payment of the difference between the amount authorized by law and the amount which these judges have heretofore received for the year 1902. But the difficulty about the position of the gentleman from New Mexico is the fact that the amount paid to these judges for that year was by the act making the appropriation for the payment of their salaries declared to be "in full compensation for their services" and his amendment proposes to pay a deficiency when in fact there was no deficiency, and could be none unless these men failed to receive the full amount authorized by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for that year, and that, the Chair understands, is not the fact.

The first paragraph of the act referred to reads as follows:

The following sums be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the services for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, for the objects hereinafter specified, namely—

While that provision applied only to the fiscal year 1902, it, in effect, repealed, so far as that year was concerned, any previous law fixing salaries at sums different from those fixed by that act. If the proposition was to make up any difference between the amount authorized by the general law and the amount it was proposed to appropriate for these salaries for the fiscal year 1904, then, in the opinion of the Chair, the amendment would be in order, but that is not the case. The proposed amendment presents an entirely different question, and in the opinion of the Chair the amendment is not in order. Accordingly, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that I came into the Hall while the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] was speaking, and I did not know just what his amendment comprehended; but if it is to increase the salaries of these Territorial judges, I am heartily in favor of it, for they deserve such increase. We are now paying to such judges from the Territorial treasury $800 each, in addition to the salaries paid by the United States Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment proposed to pay what is claimed to be the unpaid portion of the salaries of four presiding justices of the supreme and district courts of the Territory of Arizona, when in fact they have received all the law authorized.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I offer the amendment, then, modified so as to take effect for the year 1903.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to frame the amendment in an entirely different way.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let the amendment apply to the year 1903 instead of the year 1902.

The CHAIRMAN. The same ruling would apply to the year 1903. The fiscal year 1903 will expire June 30 next, and the salaries for these judges was fixed and are being paid for this fiscal year the same as the last.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEGISLATIVE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For compensation of Members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $55,000.

Mr. OLMSTED. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 15, page 78, the following:

"To George C. R. Wagoner and James J. Butler each $2,000 on account of expenses incurred by them in the contested election case of Wagoner v. Butler from the Twelfth Congressional District of Missouri; in all, $4,000."

Mr. BARNEY. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether any payment has heretofore been made in reference to this same matter?

Mr. OLMSTED. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that this is the election contest which within the past week or two has been presented to Elections Committee No. 2; that no payments have been made, and that the expenses, I am satisfied, of each contestant have largely exceeded the $2,000 which is the limit allowed by law.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, that is not yet an answer to my question. Have any payments heretofore been made to these same parties?

Mr. OLMSTED. I think I stated that no payments have been made to either party.

Mr. BARNEY. It does not exceed the amount allowed by law? Very well.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did I understand the gentleman to say that each one of these parties receives $2,000?

Mr. OLMSTED. Each one.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will say to my friend from Georgia that this is the election contest now pending. It does not exceed the amount allowed by law. By reason of the lateness of the session, it is regarded as important to follow the precedent already established.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is to pay each one of them $2,000?

Mr. OLMSTED. To pay to Mr. Wagoner and to Mr. Butler each $2,000. I will state that the bills came in so late that it was impossible to certify them to the Appropriations Committee before the bill was reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 12, page 78, the following:

"To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of February, 1903, including the Capitol police, the Official Reporters of the Senate and of the House, and W. A. Smith, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk, for extra services during the Fifty-seventh Congress, a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available."

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, this has been in this appropriation bill for the last several years. Last year, when the same amendment was offered, our worthy chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], said in part:

Mr. Chairman, just a single word. The practice has been so long followed that it is evidently the will of the House from year to year to give this extra month's salary, so that in point of fact it might be regarded as a part and parcel of the pay of the employees of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to enter into any discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To continue the employment of Alexander Scott as a laborer in the cloakroom under resolution of December 19, 1901, at $50 per month from March 4, 1903, to June 30, 1904, inclusive, $796.67.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 80, line 5, strike out the word "Alexander" and insert the word "Albert."

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, this is a mere clerical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay O. M. Enyart for compiling a Congressional Directory, embracing the biographies of all members of Congress from the Continental Congress to the Fifty-seventh Congress, which has been ordered to be printed by a concurrent resolution passed February 13, 1903, and on the certificate of the Public Printer that the manuscript therefor has been delivered to him in complete and satisfactory condition, $5,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding on page 80, at end of line 24, the following:

"To defray the expenses of the members of the joint committee of the House and Senate, authorized to attend and represent the Congress of the United States on occasion of the dedication of the buildings and grounds of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, to be held at St. Louis April 30 and May 1 and 2, 1903, commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Territory of Louisiana, $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be accredited to the account of and expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives."

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, before that amendment is offered, as it is obviously a separate paragraph, I wish to offer a motion to strike out the paragraph which has just been read. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia to withhold his amendment for a moment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if it is to perfect the paragraph, will take precedence.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I wish to strike out the paragraph before that. I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph on page 80 beginning on line 17 and ending on line 24.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph, which I move to strike out, provides for paying $5,000 for compiling the biographies of all members of Congress, from the Continental Congress through this one. When this came up in the committee Saturday it struck me as unreasonable, and as I have looked into it a little this morning, that opinion is confirmed.

Far be it from me to suggest that the biographies of members of Congress are not earnestly craved by the reading public. I am willing to admit, for the sake of argument, that there is only one thing more sought for, and that is our obituaries; and it is commendable if the public taste is turning from novels to such improving literature as the biographies of the statesmen who have sacrificed themselves on the altar of public service here.

But the objection I find to this provision is that this literature is already provided. I find that there has already been prepared, dated 1869, a 600-page book of biographies by a gentleman by the name of Lanman, which gives exactly what is provided here, down to 1869.

Then I find that even later than that, in 1878, is a book compiled by Ben: Perley Poore, who was clerk of the Printing Records Committee of the United States Senate. He was there, I am told, for twenty or thirty years, had every opportunity to perfect the information, and he has prepared a book of about 700 pages which not only gives all the biographies of Congressmen down to that date, but gives them in various forms, showing the members of each Congress in very full and elaborate detail. That brings it down to 1879, through the Forty-fifth Congress, down to a time when many of the members who are in this Congress were serving.

I am also told that there is another publication which comes down to the Forty-ninth Congress. So that all that is necessary to be done under this paragraph is to complete the work from the Forty-ninth Congress down to to-day, and this provides for a payment of $5,000 for doing that. Now, all anyone has to do in order to prepare that is to cut out from the annual directories the biography of each member and insert it. Any clerk who has two fingers which can use a pair scissors and who has enough familiarity with the alphabet to paste them in the right places can compile that in a short time. It does not require great intellectual ability to cut these biographies from the Congressional Directory and carry them down to date, if we need the information at all.

It does not seem to me we very much need it, but if we do it seems to me unreasonable that a clerk who will simply cut out these items and paste them in the right places should be paid $5,000 for doing it. It seems to me any of our clerks would be very glad, for $500 or $1,000, to do that work and complete it. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is an extravagant appropriation and very largely a needless appropriation. I move that it be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Who is this Mr. Enyart?

Mr. DALZELL. I hope this amendment will not prevail. Whatever the outside public may think of Congressional biographies, it is within the experience of every member of this House, I take it, that from time to time he is desirous of ascertaining who such and such a member of some previous Congress was. Now, it is true that there are two or three publications. There is the Lanman publication and the Poore publication, but they are both very full of errors. And so far as this being mere clerk's work is concerned, the gentleman is mistaken. I happen to know something about this.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I did not know I was treading on the gentleman.

Mr. DALZELL. I have no interest in it, of course. The young man in question lives in another State than mine. I happen only incidentally to know about it. So far from this being a mere work of cutting out from directories and pasting on paper, I happen to know that this young man has spent a very large amount of money in getting in correspondence with these various parties and their successors, their widows and children, and in verifying the records in this Poore book. I happen to know also that he has spent out of his own pocket up to this time in this work something like $2,500. He has been at work at it for years, and I think it would be very unjust, after having passed a resolution providing for the publication of this book for distribution among the members of Congress and Senators, if we should refuse to give him a fair compensation. In my judgment the compensation provided in this paragraph is not large enough, and ought to be a great deal more. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask the gentleman how this young man happened to undertake this work. Was it in accordance with any resolution of Congress?

Mr. DALZELL. I think not.

Mr. SCOTT. Or was it a private enterprise?

Mr. DALZELL. I think it was merely a labor of love on his part in the first instance. After the work was appropriated by Congress, I presume he expected to be paid for it. There are a large number of errors in the previous works.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Have we not taken possession of his property?

Mr. DALZELL. We have.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And it is ours now?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. By solemn act of Congress?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; of both Houses.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And now it is only a question of whether we pay him for it or rob him of it?

Mr. DALZELL. That is all—whether we will confiscate it or pay for it.

Mr. CANNON. Just a word, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has the right to close. There was shown to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations a concurrent resolution of the House and Senate for the printing and publishing of this work. A request was made that an item be inserted to compensate the man who prepared the manuscript. As the House and Senate, in the wisdom of the two respective bodies, had passed upon it, we appointed a subcommittee to go down and examine the manuscript. Brother BARNEY, I believe, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] were members of that subcommittee. Well, we examined it somewhat, but could not examine it exhaustively; but deferring to the superior wisdom of the House and Senate, which passed the concurrent resolution, we took to the woods. I do not know how much merit or demerit it has. I am satisfied that what the gentleman says about the Poore publication and the Lanman publication is true, as to their demerits. I apprehend there is no doubt about that. That is all I want to say about it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. As to the remark of the gentleman that there are a great many errors in the Poore book, that may be true. Nobody knows how many there are in this one. But that professed to be painstaking. Let me read one statement from the preface of this book of Mr. Poore on that subject:

> Six years' labor has failed to produce a perfect work, and to obtain much desired information. * * * There are authenticated accounts of Congressmen who would not correct the misspelling of their names in the printed public documents; and there was one Representative who heard the tally clerk give him an initial which had never belonged to him, on every roll call during a long session, without attempting to contradict the mistake.

Apparently that is an admission that there are mistakes in his record, and that no such record can be perfect. But does anybody think they are very vital or important enough to be corrected at an expense of $5,000? He spent six years on his work. He was clerk of the Senate Committee on Printing, and I think his work is probably as good a publication as is needed for the purpose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are these former publications in existence to-day?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, certainly; I got them out of the Library.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are they in the form of public documents?

Mr. STEELE. The only way that they can be obtained, I understand, is by paying $8 apiece for them. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that his colleague the Senator from Massachusetts, who was for a while of the opinion that this work would not be desirable, has changed his mind and become in favor of it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know anything about the opinions of any Senator upon this work. The only question with me is the worth of the work. Now, it does seem to me incredible that this gentleman has spent in correspondence $2,500.

Mr. DALZELL. I did not confine it to correspondence. Correspondence and otherwise.

Mr. PEARRE. I would like to ask whether this gentleman is an employee of the Government?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know who he is at all. Perhaps the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] can tell.

Mr. STEELE. He is not.

Mr. PEARRE. Who is he?

Mr. STEELE. He is a young gentleman from Indiana, and a very bright young gentleman, who has been acting as my secretary during this short session; and this was in order to help him and give him an opportunity to do the work necessary to be done to complete the work. He has employed a force of four or five people to assist him; and it is only to be taken after it has had the approval, as the bill says, of the Public Printer. He asked that it be left to any person or persons the Committee on Appropriations designated.

Mr. PEARRE. He is the gentleman's private secretary?

Mr. STEELE. He is at this time.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to interfere in any way with the private secretary of my friend from Indiana, or to interfere with any speculation that he should originate, but it does seem to me that any of our private secretaries would have been very glad to do it at a very much less sum.

Now, the assertion is made here that this is in pursuance of a resolution of this Congress. It seems——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that he may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman has informed us that this Congress has already passed a resolution for this purpose, and therefore we are bound by it. It strikes me that is an argument that ought not to deter us from refusing this request, because if there is one method of getting appropriations which is inherently vicious and ought to be discouraged and suppressed it is by bringing in resolutions apparently calling for no expenditure, and then afterwards coming and asking an appropriation to carry them out. This resolution naturally passed without challenge. It said nothing about purchasing a manuscript. This young man can use his manuscript as he will. He is not obliged to give it to us, and if he thinks many people want the book and it is of value, he has the copy, and can go and sell it. He is not bound to sell it to us.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated we had confiscated the manuscript. I desire to ask the gentleman if we had laid violent hands on the young man and taken his property away from him?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was a little carried away by his enthusiasm. The gentleman, I understand, still has the manuscript, and we will not get it until we pay him. He does not have to give it up, and I think if he would take it to some other purchaser he would get a very small sum for it. I am afraid it is like most of the articles which owners press upon Congress for sale, without market value, and worth only what we can be beguiled into paying for it.

I object to this frequent occurrence of a man beginning some work which he thinks he can sell to the Government, getting the Government to half commit itself indirectly to the work, and then coming in and demanding payment as a right. I do not believe that resolution which passed this House was passed because the House cared for this manuscript; I do not think it was passed to fill a long-felt want of the reading public, but it was passed to fill a want in that young man's pocket. [Laughter.] It is of course justifiable for him, justifiable for anybody, to engage in a work and try to lobby through Congress a bill which will buy it of him. But he takes the risk, and I think it is a very bad practice for us to encourage.

I remember before our committee a gentleman came in with a bill which he said put upon him certain new duties, and asked an appropriation for the performance of those duties, as if it was a reluctant burden on him, and we found out afterwards that he himself had proposed and prepared the bill and pushed it through, and then he innocently came in and said, "You have passed this bill and now you must give me the money for the performance of those duties." It seems to me that is what we are doing in this case. I do not know anything about the passage of this resolution, but I venture my opinion that it was prompted by this man in order to sell this manuscript which he has prepared, was put through by his friends without attracting attention, and now, having passed the bill without any appropriation, they come and say we are bound to pass this section to pay for it. I do not think we are. I think that is one good reason why the House should not pass this item. I think any purchase by the Government which is originated and pushed and carried along by the person who has the property to sell should be suspiciously scrutinized.

So it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there are three arguments against this appropriation. First, we ought not to encourage that kind of legislation; second, we have already got in available form the information this book contains, quite enough to satisfy our needs and the needs of the reading public, and, third, we are paying an exorbitant sum for the only useful work that is offered us—$5,000 for the biographies from the Forty-fifth Congress to now.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the facts are these. This young man prepared this Congressional record ,and then the members from both Houses saw the manuscript, and finally both Houses adopted a resolution that it should be printed and accepted it at his hands. The Appropriations Committee came along after that, and finding that concurrent resolution, that he had done the work, they proposed in this bill to pay him for that work. The time for the gentleman from Massachusetts to have objected was when that concurrent resolution was before the House, and not now. If he wants to stop that kind of legislation, stop it at its incipiency, and do not let a young man bend over his table and desk at midnight for weeks and weeks, spend his time and money, when it was authorized by both Houses, and then, when the proposition comes up in the House to remunerate him, object to a fair compensation.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I understand this work of bending over his desk was nearly all performed long before this session. That is what the gentleman from Indiana says——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech; but he suggests that the work was done before he was private secretary. It was accepted by both Houses and the Public Printer. Now, then, the Appropriations Committee could do no more and no less than to offer the man a fair compensation for his work. If $5,000 is too much, amend it; but do not strike out the whole appropriation after it has been done and accepted by both Houses.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 38, noes 45.

So the motion was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDGMENTS, COURT OF CLAIMS.

For the payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, reported to Congress at its present session in House Document No. 360, $45,964.06: Provided, That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

Mr. BARNEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 9, page 83, after the word "judgments," the following: "except the judgment in favor of Elias E. Barnes." And in lines 11 and 12 strike out "$45,964.06" and insert "$22,269.59."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNEY. I offer a further amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in page 83, after line 14, as follows:

"And provided further, That no judgment heretofore or hereafter rendered under the act of June 16, 1880, entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes,' shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury until said judgment shall have been reported to, and specific authority for payment thereof granted by, Congress, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and from all final judgments or decrees heretofore rendered in suits of the character of those mentioned in said proviso an appeal shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States at any time within ninety days after the passage of this act, except in cases where the amounts found due by said court have been paid at the Treasury."

Mr. COWHERD. I wish to reserve a point of order on that amendment until I hear some explanation from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BARNEY].

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this amendment and also for the one offered just before this I will state:

By an act of Congress passed in 1880 it was provided that a certain class of cases against the District of Columbia could be tried and final judgment rendered in the Court of Claims; and it was provided further that an appeal could be taken from such judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States. Many cases were tried, some being determined in favor of the plaintiff and some in favor of the defendant, and in many cases appeals were taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. But by a provision attached to one of the appropriation acts of 1900 it was enacted—

That no judgment heretofore or hereafter rendered under the act of June 16, 1880—

The law to which I have just referred—shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury until said judgment shall have been reported to, and specific authority for payment therefor granted by, Congress.

Now, the Supreme Court of the United States decided, upon an appeal taken to it in one of the cases determined by the Court of Claims after that proviso, that the Supreme Court of the United States had no jurisdiction in those cases upon an appeal; in other words, that no appeal could be taken from the Court of Claims in that class of cases, because the judgment was not a final judgment. Consequently we must either pay those judgments—or rather findings, for that is all they amount to, under the decision of the Supreme Court—or we must take an appeal. We are advised by the attorney for the District of Columbia that an appeal ought to be taken, because they think they can reverse those cases upon an appeal. And while it is true that Congress has the power to refuse to make an appropriation if it sees fit, yet we all know that these claimants will come to Congress from time to time hereafter and eventually get the amount as fixed in the finding of the Court of Claims. So that we must meet this question sooner or later, and we think it is advisable that provision be made here, as proposed in this amendment, for the taking of an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. COWHERD. Does this include any of the judgments rendered under the act of 1895—the act which was repealed by the act of 1897?

Mr. BARNEY. I do not understand that it does. We were told by the attorneys that this was the only case that it will affect; that all the others have been settled by the payment of the final judgment or in some other way.

Mr. COWHERD. There were some judgments rendered under the act of 1895, which act, as the gentleman will remember, made it compulsory upon the Court of Claims to allow board rates for this class of work regardless of the fact whether the parties had written contracts or not. I think this amendment ought to be carefully guarded, because the act of 1895, as the gentleman will remember, was afterwards repealed in 1897, as soon as Congress discovered what it had done.

Mr. BARNEY. As I understand, this amendment applies only to a class of cases which came under the act of 1880.

Mr. COWHERD. The act of 1895 was an amendment of the act of 1880, as I remember. The act of 1880 referred all these claims—claims against the District arising under the old board of public works—to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BARNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWHERD. And then the act of 1895 amended the act of 1880, providing that when these cases were referred to the Court of Claims the court must allow the board rates, regardless of the question whether there was a written contract or not. That act of 1895, as I have already suggested, was repealed by the act of 1897. I am suggesting to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I think great care should be exercised in regard to these claims, because some of them were undoubtedly improper claims, and yet judgment was obtained upon them in the Court of Claims, because Congress by that law made it mandatory upon the court to render such judgment.

Mr. BARNEY. This amendment was drawn by the attorney for the District of Columbia, and is in the exact language which was submitted by him, and he informed us that it applied only to the cases arising under the act of 1880.

Mr. COWHERD. I do not want to reserve the point of order if it does not affect those cases arising under the act of 1895.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri withdraws the point of order.

Mr. COWHERD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk then concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent of the House to return to page 43 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment, which has already been assented to by the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to return to page 43 for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, after line 14, insert:

"To reimburse H. W. Wingard for expenses incurred in transporting to his late home the body of Edward Hett, jr., late an enlisted man in the Navy, who lost his life in the line of duty on the U. S. S. Boston, off San Francisco, Cal., on January 29, 1903. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to use so much as may be necessary of the unexpended balance of the appropriation made June 7, 1900, to enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transported to their homes the remains of officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps who die or are killed in action, ashore or afloat, outside of the continental limits of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the House at all on this matter further than to say that the chaiman of the committee has no objection to this amendment and it is approved by the Secretary of the Navy, who has also written a letter approving it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 80 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to page 80 for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 80, after amendment last adopted on that page:

"To pay Lapse D. McCord for services in preparing copy for the Printer of the State papers and all correspondence, and indexing the same, bearing upon the purchase of the Territory of Louisiana, ordered to be printed by concurrent resolution, to be paid on acceptance of said copy by the Public Printer and on his approval, $1,000, or so much thereof as is necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is in pursuance of a concurrent resolution passed at the last session of Congress, in April, to print 4,000 copies for the use of the House and 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, of the state papers and state correspondence, including the treaty touching upon the purchase of the Territory of Louisiana. This copying had to be done from the official records, which could not be used by the Printer. The other work necessarily followed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and the amendments thereto, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will submit them in gross. The Chair hears no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 21, 1903:

H. R. 15767. An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania; and

H. R. 16915. An act authorizing the commissioners' court of Escambia County, Ala., to construct a bridge across Conecuh River, at or near a point known as McGowans Ferry, in said county and State.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 1341. An act to amend the record of Maj. John Murphy—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 7375. An act granting an increase of pension to Alfred Woodman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1361. An act granting an increase of pension to Lucy A. Harding—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 6158. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories," approved March 2, 1897—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 5279. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to restore to public entry lands embraced in whole or in part within segregations for reservoirs—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

STATUES OF COUNT PULASKI AND BARON STEUBEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 16) to provide for the erection at Washington, D. C., of bronze equestrian statues to the memory of the late Brig. Gen. Count Casimir Pulaski and Baron von Steuben.

Mr. McCLEARY. I move that the House agree to the Senate amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire what the Senate amendment is. I understand that it moves to strike out all after the enacting clause, and we should like to know more about it.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read, if desired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That there shall be erected in the city of Washington, D. C., a statue of Brig. Gen. Count Casimir Pulaski, of Poland, who came to America and, after declaring his intention to become a citizen of the Republic, offered his sword to Washington, under whose leadership in the great struggle for American independence he lost his life at the siege of Savannah, Ga., October 11, 1779; and for the purpose of procuring and erecting said statue with a suitable pedestal, and for the preparation of a site, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of a commission to be composed of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and the president of the Pulaski monument Polish central committee.

"SEC. 2. That there shall be erected in the city of Washington, D. C., a statue of Frederick William Augustus Henry Ferdinand, Baron von Steuben, major-general and inspector-general in the Continental Army; and for the purpose of procuring and erecting said statue with a suitable pedestal, and for the preparation of a site, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of a commission to be composed of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-seventh Congress.

"SEC. 3. That the commissions herein created are empowered, respectively, to select sites for the statues authorized by this act on ground belonging to the Government: Provided, That said statues shall not be located in the grounds of the Capitol or Library of Congress."

Amend the title so as to read:

"An act to provide for the erection at Washington, D. C., of statues to the memory of Brigadier-General Count Pulaski and Major-General Baron von Steuben, of the Continental Army."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK AND JERSEY RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 159) granting to the New York and Jersey Railroad Company the right to construct and operate an underground railway under land owned by the United States in the city of New York, the same being similar to a House resolution favorably reported.

The joint resolution was read as follows:

Whereas the United States is the owner of the block of land in the borough of Manhattan, city, county, and State of New York, bounded by Greenwich, Christopher, Washington, and Barrow streets; and

Whereas the New York and Jersey Railroad Company proposes to construct a tunnel railway under certain streets in the borough of Manhattan, in the city aforesaid, including Greenwich street, in front of the said block of land: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to give the consent of the United States as the owner of the block of land in the borough of Manhattan, city, county, and State of New York, bounded by Greenwich, Christopher, Washington, and Barrow streets, to the New York and Jersey Railroad Company for the construction and operation of an underground railway under and along the line of Greenwich street in front of said block of land: Provided, That the plans and specifications for such underground railway, so far as the same affect the property of the United States, as above set forth, and the manner in which the work is to be performed, shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the similar House joint resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. CANNON (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for construction of a building for the Department—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting estimates of appropriation for pay of salaries—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a statement of the documents received and distributed by the Department during the calendar year 1902—to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

I give notice that on to-morrow, if the situation of business will justify it, I shall ask the Senate to take up this bill for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

COURTS IN TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17088) to create a new division of the eastern judicial district of Texas, to report it favorably with amendments. It is a short court bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary were, in section 1, line 3, after the word "Bowie," to strike out the word "Morris;" and in section 3, page 1, line 12, after the word "Bowie," to strike out the word "Morris."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DOCUMENTS IN FOLDING ROOM.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, under the direction of the Committee on Printing of the Senate, be, and he hereby is, directed to cause an inventory to be made of all public documents stored in the Senate folding room, and an abstract of the records of the folding room, showing the documents to the credit of each Senator; and if upon the making of said inventory and abstract there is shown to be a surplus in excess of those to the credit of Senators such documents as are valuable for distribution shall be put to the credit of Senators of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and such of the surplus as he may desire to be turned over to the superintendent of documents of the Government Printing Office for distribution, those remaining after the distribution to Senators and the superintendent of documents that are useless to be condemned and sold as waste paper and the proceeds thereof covered into the Treasury.

ORATION ON THE LATE PRESIDENT M'KINLEY.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in the form of eulogies 24,000 copies of the oration delivered by the Hon. John Hay in the Hall of the House of Representatives during the exercises in memory of the late President McKinley on February 27, 1902; 16,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 8,000 for the use of the Senate.

BANKRUPTCY LAWS.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound together in paper 30,000 copies of the following documents, namely: United States Bankrupt Law of 1898, uniform system, with marginal notes and index; General Orders and Forms in Bankruptcy, adopted and established by the Supreme Court of the United States November 28, 1898, and Public Law No. 62, for the amendment of the Bankruptcy Law, passed by the Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, January 28, 1903, of which 10,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 20,000 copies for the use of the House.

TREATIES, LAWS, ETC., RELATING TO INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 1,500 copies of Senate Document No. 452, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, entitled "Treaties, Laws, Executive Orders, etc., Relating to Indian Affairs," 100 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 400 for the House of Representatives, 100 for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the remaining 900 shall be sold by the Superintendent of Documents.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, after the words "Indian Affairs," in line 6, to insert "fifty of which shall be for the use of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, and fifty for the use of the House Committee on Indian Affairs;" in the same line, after the words "one hundred," to strike out the words "of which shall be;" and in line 9, to strike out "nine," before "hundred," and insert "eight."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the concurrent resolution be read the way it will stand with the amendments agreed to.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution as amended as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 1,500 copies of Senate Document No. 452, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, entitled "Treaties, Laws, Executive Orders, etc., relating to Indian Affairs," 50 of which shall be for the use of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, 50 for the use of the House Committee on Indian Affairs, 100 for the use of the Senate, 400 for the House of Representatives, 100 for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the remaining 800 shall be sold by the superintendent of documents.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know why this document should be sold in preference to all others. Each Senator will get only one copy of it.

Mr. PLATT of New York. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs presented it in that shape.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are a great many Indians out in the Western country, and——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is perfectly apparent that this document can be sold. There are a great many inquiries for it from people who are engaged in practice with regard to Indian matters, and it is going to be a somewhat expensive document.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator say it is to be an expensive document?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is rather an expensive document, and we felt that if enough copies were provided so that each Senator and each Member could have one, it was quite proper that individuals who desire it outside of Congress should pay for it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, what will it contain? The Senator is familiar with it. I do not see anything that would make it any more expensive than the volume we published containing the treaties with foreign nations.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Of course it is not so very expensive, but it is in two volumes. We sell our Revised Statutes; we do not distribute them. It consists of treaties, statutes, decisions, and rules of practice, and we thought we might assimilate it to our Revised Statutes, and if people want copies let them pay for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution as amended.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

PROPOSED PENSIONS TO FREEDMEN.

Mr. GALLINGER. During the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress I made an adverse report upon a bill which proposed pensions to the freedmen of the country. During the past few days there have been a great many calls for this report. In one instance I have had a call for 500 copies. I ask unanimous consent that a thousand copies of the report be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. HANSBROUGH on the 31st ultimo, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at an annual salary of $1,200, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committeee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum until otherwise provided for by law.

THOMAS JEFFERSON MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. DANIEL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 7307) to provide certain souvenir medallions for the benefit of the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask that it may be put on its passage.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DANIEL subsequently said: I ask that the letter which I hold in my hand from the Secretary of the Treasury may be printed in the RECORD in connection with the motion I made this morning in regard to the passage of the bill respecting the Jefferson souvenir medallion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks that the letter which he sends to the desk be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 24, 1903.

Hon. NELSON W. ALDRICH,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st instant, inclosing Senate bill No. 7307, entitled "A bill to provide certain souvenir medallions for the benefit of the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States," for report.

In reply it is respectfully stated that should Congress enact into a law the bill inclosed, the necessary dies could be engraved, and the souvenir medallions authorized struck from time to time, as required, by the mint at Philadelphia.

The Department sees no objection to the passage of the bill.

Respectfully,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to make an investigation of internal-revenue, customs, currency and coinage matters, and to report from time to time to the Senate the result thereof; and for this purpose they are authorized to sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the recess or sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as they may deem advisable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ such stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as may be necessary, the expense of such investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, and calls the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] to it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho will state it.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to know the status of the resolution which I introduced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is on the table, and has not yet been reached. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the invitation extended to the Congress of the United States by the National Commission of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition and by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company to attend the dedicatory ceremonies of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, to be held at St. Louis, Mo., April 30 and May 1 and 2, 1903, be, and is hereby, accepted.

That the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a committee to consist of 7 Senators and 11 Representatives elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress, to attend the dedicatory ceremonies referred to, and to represent the Congress of the United States on the occasion of the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Territory of Louisiana at St. Louis, Mo., April 30 and May 1 and 2, 1903.

Mr. BURNHAM. By direction of the Committee on Industrial Expositions, I move that the Senate concur in the resolution.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think it would be well to increase the number of the committee, and I will, therefore, move as an amendment that there be 10 Senators and 15 Members of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out "seven" where it appears before the word "Senators" and insert "ten," and strike out "eleven" where it appears before the word "Representatives" and insert "fifteen."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate two resolutions coming over by unanimous consent from a previous day, the one offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] to follow the one offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. The resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. QUAY on the 18th instant, as follows:

Whereas House bill 12543, to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States has been under discussion in the Senate since the 10th day of December last, and must fail unless voted upon at an early date:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that by unanimous consent a date and hour prior to the 2d of March next should be fixed for a final vote upon the bill and all amendments that are pending or may be offered thereto.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the occasion for the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania has passed, but when it was last before the Senate a rule was added, upon the motion of some Senator whose identity I can not just now remember, for a cloture, upon which it was understood the sense of the Senate was to be taken. Now, I would be very glad, if it is the disposition of Senators, to make a test of the sense of the Senate upon the cloture question.

Mr. QUARLES. I can not hear a word the Senator is saying.

Mr. QUAY. I would be very glad to have the sense of the Senate tested on cloture by a yea-and-nay vote upon that rule, for future reference. The parliamentary status, I think, of the resolution is that the pending question is upon the rule which was offered as an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think the question is upon the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules; at least that will be the question as soon as I am able to get the floor to make the motion, if it has not already been made.

Mr. QUAY. Then the Senator from Rhode Island is not willing to take a vote on the rule of cloture?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Committee on Rules had better consider all these propositions first. That is the orderly method of procedure in the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senators who were so vociferous the other day in opposition to a cloture rule are not disposed to go on record, I have no objection to the reference of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

ELMER E. FORESHAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DUBOIS on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Civil Service Commission is hereby directed to furnish to the United States Senate a statement of the charges and evidence on account of which Elmer E. Foreshay was dismissed from the surveyor-general's office of Idaho.

Also, whether under the ruling of the civil service he is eligible to any other position in the Government service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Idaho will permit the resolution to go over until to-morrow. I have a communication upon the subject from the Civil Service Commission, and it is at my house. I should like to present it before the resolution is acted upon.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well, Mr. President. I would be exceedingly glad to see a communication from the Civil Service Commission on the subject. Let the resolution go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks that the resolution may lie on the table without losing its place. The Chair hears no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16910) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the committee amendments be considered on the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask that the first amendment be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the first amendment proposed by the committee be passed over. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PROCTOR. Let the reading commence on page 46.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will commence the reading on page 46.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill at line 13 on page 46.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Department of Agriculture," on page 46, line 24, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture from $2,250 to $2,500; and on page 48, line 2, to increase the total for the salaries of employees in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture from $69,450 to $69,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 14, to increase the total appropriation for office of the Secretary of Agriculture from $74,410 to $74,660.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Weather Bureau," on page 49, line 18, after the word "dollars," to strike out "two skilled mechanics, at" and insert "one skilled mechanic;" in line 20, after the word "dollars," to strike out "each $2,400; three" and insert "five;" in line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" in line 24, before the word "skilled," to strike out "seven" and insert "six;" in line 25, after the word "thousand," to strike out "eight hundred;" on page 50, line 1, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighty" and insert "forty;" in line 12, after the word "messengers," to insert "messenger boys;" and in line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Weather Bureau: Office of Chief of Weather Bureau: One Chief of Bureau, $5,000; 1 Assistant Chief of Bureau, $3,000; 3 professors of meteorology, at $3,000 each, for duty in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the needs of the Bureau may demand, $9,000; 2 professors of meteorology, at $2,500 each, for duty in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the needs of the Bureau may demand, $5,000; 2 district forecasters, at $2,000 each, for duty in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the needs of the Bureau may demand, $4,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,250; 4 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each, $8,000; 1 librarian and climatologist, $2,000; 4 clerks of class 4, $7,200; 1 chief of division of supplies, $1,800; 6 clerks of class 3, $9,600; 17 clerks of class 2, $23,800; 24 clerks of class 1, $28,800; 15 clerks, at $1,000 each, $15,000; 7 clerks, at $900 each, $6,300; 4 copyists or typewriters, at $840 each, $3,360; 1 copyist or typewriter, $720; 1 chief mechanic, $1,400; 1 skilled mechanic, $1,200; 5 skilled mechanics, at $1,000 each, $5,000; 1 engineer, $1,200; 1 captain of the watch, $1,000; 1 batteryman, $840; 6 skilled artisans, at $840 each, $5,040; 5 messengers or laborers, at $720 each, $3,600; 3 firemen, at $720 each, $2,160; 3 watchmen, at $720 each, $2,160; 6 messengers or laborers, at $660 each, $3,960; 13 messengers or laborers, at $600 each, $7,800; 4 messengers or laborers, at $480 each, $1,920; 5 messengers, messenger boys or laborers, at $450 each, $2,250; 1 charwoman, $360; 3 charwomen, at $240 each, $720; in all, $175,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 9, before the word "district," to insert "inspectors;" in line 10, before the word "local," to strike out "inspectors," and in line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "seventy-four;" so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Weather Bureau: Outside of the city of Washington: Professors of meteorology, inspectors, district forecasters, local forecasters, section directors, observers, assistant observers, operators, repairmen, station agents, messengers, messenger boys, laborers, and other necessary employees, for duty in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda, who, without additional expense to the Government, may hereafter, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be granted leaves of absence not to exceed thirty days in any one year, $474,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 22, to increase the appropriation for general expenses of the Weather Bureau from $496,780 to $499,780.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 10, after the word "buildings," to insert "or grounds;" so as to make the clause read:

Buildings, Weather Bureau: For the purchase of sites and the erection of not less than five buildings for use as Weather Bureau observatories, and for all necessary labor, materials, and expenses, plans and specifications to be prepared and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and work done under the supervision of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, including the purchase of instruments, furniture, supplies, flagstaffs, and storm-warning towers to properly equip these stations: Provided, That if any of the money for these several buildings remains unexpended for the special purposes for which it is appropriated, so much of it as is necessary may be expended for the repair, improvement, and equipment of any other buildings or grounds owned by the Government and occupied by the Weather Bureau, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 24, to increase the total appropriation for the Weather Bureau from $1,248,560 to $1,253,520.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Animal Industry," on page 54, line 14, to increase the appropriation for the salary of 1 chief of biochemic division from $2,500 to $2,750; in line 16, to increase the appropriation for the salary of 1 assistant in biochemic division from $1,800 to $2,000; and on page 55, line 19, to increase the total appropriation for salaries of the Bureau of Animal Industry from $87,380 to $87,830.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 18, to increase the appropriation for inspection of meats and animals, etc., from $1,200,000 to $1,250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 3, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Animal Industry from $1,287,380 to $1,337,830.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 59, line 9, after the word "pathologist," to strike out "who shall be Chief of Bureau in absence of Chief;" in line 18, after the word "dollars," to insert "one clerk class four, $1,800;" in line 19, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "three;" in line 20, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six thousand four" and insert "four thousand eight," and on page 60, line 2, to increase the total appropriation for salaries of employees in the Bureau of Plant Industry from $62,730 to $62,930; so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Plant Industry, salaries: One plant physiologist and pathologist, who shall be Chief of Bureau, $4,000; 1 plant physiologist and pathologist, $2,750; 1 botanist, $2,500; 1 pomologist, $2,500; 1 agrostologist, $2,500; 1 assistant pathologist, $1,800; 1 assistant botanist $1,800; 1 assistant pomologist, $1,800; 1 assistant agrostologist, $1,800; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 1 clerk class 4, $1,800; 3 clerks class 3, $4,800; 9 clerks class 2, $12,600; 9 clerks class 1, $10,800; 6 clerks, at $1,000 each, $6,000; 2 clerks, at $900 each, $1,800; 2 clerks, at $840 each, $1,680; in all, $62,930.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "thirty-five;" and in line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert "five thousand dollars of which sum shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

General expenses, Bureau of Plant Industry; vegetable pathological and physiological investigations: Investigating the nature of diseases injurious to fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, vegetable, and other useful plants; experiments in the treatment of the same; the study of plant physiology in relation to crop production and the improvement of crops by breeding and selection; to investigate the diseases affecting citrus fruits, pineapples, and truck crops grown during the winter in the Southern States; to investigate canaigre and other tannin-bearing plants; to investigate and report upon the diseases affecting plants on the Pacific coast; to originate or introduce improved varieties of fruits and vegetables in cooperation with the section of seed and plant introduction; to study the relation of soil and climatic conditions to diseases of plants, particularly with reference to the California vine diseases and diseases of the sugar beet, in cooperation with the Bureau of Soils, and for other purposes connected with the discovery and practical application of improved methods of crop production; to continue the work of originating, by breeding and selection, in cooperation with the other divisions of the Department and the experiment stations, new varieties of oranges, lemons, and other tropical and subtropical fruits more resistant to cold and disease and of better quality; varieties of wheat and other cereals more resistant to rust and smut and better suited to the various sections of this country; varieties of cotton more resistant to disease and of longer and better staple, and varieties of pears and apples more resistant to blight and better adapted for export; to investigate the causes of decay in forest timber and timber used for construction purposes, and to devise means for preventing the decay of the same; to investigate the practical application in agriculture of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by bacteria and other micro-organisms in soils and in the root tubercles of leguminous and other plants; to cultivate and distribute these nitrogen fixers and to determine the conditions most favorable to their development; to study and find methods for preventing the algal and other contaminations of water supplies; the employment of investigators, local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and student scientific aids at an annual salary of $480 each, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for telegraph and telephone service; for gas and electric current; purchase of chemicals and apparatus required in the field and laboratory; necessary traveling expenses; for express and freight charges; the preparation of reports and illustrations; the rent and repairs of a building, not to exceed $3,000 per annum; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, and for other expenses connected with the practical work of the investigations, $135,000, $5,000 of which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty-two;" in line 23, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Five thousand dollars of which sum may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be expended for the establishment in the State of California of experiment stations for studying the nature of the phylloxera, Anaheim, and other diseases of vines, and for ascertaining the best means for protecting vineyards against their ravages.

So as to make the clause read:

Pomological investigations: Investigating, collecting, and disseminating information relating to the fruit industry; the collection and distribution of seeds, shrubs, trees, and specimens; and for collecting and modeling fruits, vegetables, and other plants, and furnishing duplicate models to the experiment stations of the several States, as far as found practicable; the employment of investigators, local and special agents, clerks, assistants, student scientific aids at an annual salary of $480 each, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for gas and electric current; for telegraph and telephone services; for express and freight charges; for all necessary office fixtures and supplies and for traveling and other necessary expenses, to continue the investigations and experiments in the introduction of the culture of European table grapes and the study of the diseases that affect them, for the purpose of discovering remedies therefor, this work to be done in cooperation with the section of seed and plant introduction; to investigate in cooperation with the other divisions and bureaus of the Department and the experiment stations of the several States the market conditions affecting the fruit and vegetable trade in the United States and foreign countries, and the methods of harvesting, packing, storing, and shipping fruit and vegetables, and for experimental shipments of fruits and vegetables to foreign countries, for the purpose of increasing the exportation of American fruits and vegetables, and for all necessary expenses connected with the practical work of the same, and such fruits and vegetables as are needed for these investigations and experimental shipments may be bought in open market and disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is authorized to apply the moneys received from the sales of such fruits and vegetables toward the continuation and repetition of these investigations and experimental shipments; to investigate, map, and report upon the commercial fruit districts of the United States, for the purpose of determining the relative adaptability of the several important fruits thereto, by a study of the conditions of soil and climate, and of the prevalence of plant diseases existing therein as related to commercial fruit production, $42,000, $5,000 of which sum may in the discretion of the Secretary be expended for the establishment in the State of California of experiment stations for studying the nature of the phylloxera, Anaheim, and other diseases of vines, and for ascertaining the best means for protecting vineyards against their ravages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 10, to increase the appropriation for botanical investigations and experiments from $55,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, line 16, to increase the appropriation for grass and forage-plant investigations from $30,000 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 13, to increase the appropriation for maintenance of the general experimental farm and agricultural station on the Arlington estate, in the State of Virginia, from $15,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 5, before the word "transportation," to insert "fuel;" in line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred" and insert "two hundred and eighty;" and in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-eight" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; for rent of building, not to exceed $3,000; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, gas, and electric current; traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $280,000, of which amount not more than $50,000 shall be expended for labor in the city of Washington, D. C., and not less than $210,000 shall be allotted for Congressional distribution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 12, to increase the total appropriation for the Bureau of Plant Industry from $612,730 to $684,930.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Forestry," on page 72, line 24, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one field assistant, $720;" on page 73, line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "eight" and insert "one," and in the same line, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Forestry, salaries: One forester, who shall be Chief of Bureau, $3,500; 1 assistant forester, $2,500; 1 assistant forester, $2,000; 1 assistant forester, $1,800; 1 stenographer, $1,200; 1 field assistant, $1,500; 1 field assistant, $1,400; 1 field assistant, $1,200; 1 field assistant, $1,000; 10 collaborators, at $300 each, $3,000; 1 clerk class 3, $1,600; 1 photographer, $1,200; 1 computer, $1,000; 3 clerks class 1, $3,600; 2 clerks, at $1,000 each, $2,000; 4 clerks, at $900 each, $3,600; 7 clerks, at $720 each, $5,040; in all, $37,140.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 14, after the word "lumbering," to insert:

And whenever the boundaries of any forest reserve are substantially adjusted, the control of such reserve, except as to titles, may, by Executive order, be transferred to and vested in the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture may protect, dispose of, and reproduce timber and natural or cultivated growth on forest experiment stations set apart by the President for such experiments and investigations.

Mr. PROCTOR. That entire amendment is withdrawn, Mr. President.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Before the amendment is withdrawn, I should like to make an inquiry, and that is, who or what Department at present has custody and care of the forest reserves?

Mr. PROCTOR. The Interior Department.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Of course I do not want to object to the withdrawal of the amendment, but I do want to say that I believe great care ought to be exercised in the protection of the forest reserves.

We have set apart certain forest reserves, and the timber and undergrowth in those reserves ought to be conserved and protected. My information is that they are not; that either with the permission of the officers who have control of these forest reserves, or without such permission, parties are authorized to pasture and otherwise use them, and that such pasturage and use are seriously damaging those forest reserves, destroying the growth of the smaller timber, and generally interfering with the purposes for which those forest reserves were set apart. I wish to know whether the Senator has any information on that subject. That has been my information. If the transfer of the care and protection of these forest reserves to the Agricultural Department would tend to the preservation of them, I should be very glad to have that control transferred.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, my limited information of this matter agrees with that of the Senator from Connecticut. I have given it no special attention, as the reserves are under the Department of the Interior. From what I have heard I agree with the Senator's views, but the committee were informed that the retention of this provision in the bill would lead to very extended discussion; that it would be impossible to pass it; that this provision has been acted upon adversely in another body, and that it was useless at this session to consider it. Therefore we consented to striking it out, some members of the committee being opposed to the amendment, although it was agreed to in the committee meeting.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, if that is the conclusion of the committee, I am not going to make any objection. I understand that we have another committee of the Senate on Forest Reservations, which deals with the subject of forest reserves. I am now informed that this question of the spoliation of forest reserves has been considered by that committee, and that there is a disposition, a desire, and intention that this spoliation which has been going on shall be checked and stopped. In that view of the subject I do not wish to take the time of the Senate longer, but I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the fact as represented to me, that very large injury was being done to the forest reserves.

Mr. RAWLINS. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont, in charge of this bill, if it contains any provision looking to the further protection of the forest reservations?

Mr. PROCTOR. There is nothing in the bill now concerning the forest reservations. That subject belongs to the Interior Department.

Mr. RAWLINS. If I understood the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] they suggest a matter which is of very great importance. At present the forest reservations operate in no degree to conserve the water supply or to protect or preserve the timber. The forest reservation in my own State is being invaded by sheep and cattle, the timber is being destroyed, and I have been reliably informed that no steps are being taken for the preservation of the reservation or to secure the very end for which it was established. I am also informed that this is true of other forest reservations throughout the West.

There is one other thing to which I should like to invite the attention of the Senate in this connection, and that is that some officer assumes to license people to graze their sheep and cattle upon the reservation and also to take timber from it; that while one class of people are excluded from participation in this privilege others are being admitted to it, and that those who are admitted practically go in without any restriction upon them in such a way that the timber on the reservation is being destroyed and the undergrowth and brush are being obliterated so that they in no degree serve the purpose for which the reservation was established.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, the remark of the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] calls for a word.

I do not suppose the subject of forest reserves is properly under discussion on this bill, inasmuch as they are entirely under the Interior Department, and this bill deals only with the Agricultural Department. If I am incorrect in that statement the chairman of the committee will correct me.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Wyoming is correct. I understand, if the Senator will allow me, that the matter of forest reserves is dealt with on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the way I understand it. But in this connection and in view of the remarks of the Senator from Utah, I want to observe that in my locality the difficulty has been, not that there has been too little care exercised in the preservation of forest reserves, but that the Interior Department has perhaps gone further in the details of their care than we have thought just and necessary under all the circumstances.

In my own State, for instance, the Interior Department I think has paid special attention to the preservation of the forests and the conservation of the water supply. It is true that the Interior Department has made regulations under which certain classes of live stock may be permitted to graze upon the reserves, but, in our opinion, it has gone to the limit of the necessity for safety in that regard. I think nobody can complain that the Secretary of the Interior has not done everything in his power to protect the reserves, not only in the prevention of forest fires, but in protecting them against devastation by sheep and cattle.

Mr. RAWLINS. One additional word in this connection. As to the statement made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], my information that little protection was being afforded to the forest reservations came from officials in the Interior Department. I was there informed that the reservation in my own State had had too little protection; that, without permission, sheep had invaded the reservation in such numbers that it was impossible for the Department, with the force which it had at its command, to exclude them, and from necessity, they permitted the sheep to continue upon the reservation practically without limitation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will allow me, I suppose that that was simply because the Department did not have money enough to properly police the reservation; that they did not have sufficient force, in other words, to keep off the sheep, and Utah sheep, according to my experience, will go almost anywhere that any live animal will go.

Mr. RAWLINS. There is no barrier that will prevent an invasion of Wyoming sheep. The trouble with the Senator from Wyoming has been that Wyoming sheep have been excluded from the forest reservation in Utah, while free access has been accorded to the sheep owners of Utah.

That, however, is not the point I rose to suggest to the Senate; but as the matter does not properly come on this bill, I do not care to further indulge in discussion, as there is no object to be gained by it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I desire before this matter passes from the attention of the Senate to put in a very brief extract from a letter written to me by a gentleman whom I know very well. He is the grandson of a distinguished Senator who once occupied a seat in this body from Connecticut, a son of one of the judges of our supreme court, and a lawyer of ability, who lost his health and was compelled to go to California for its restoration. He is a man of the highest intelligence, with no prejudices, and he has written a very long letter on this subject, which convinces me that something ought to be done more than is now being done to protect the forest reserves, certainly in the locality of which he speaks.

I will not take the time of the Senate long, but simply desire to read one extract from the letter. The writer says:

Ventura County is one of the richest in southern California. The fertile Santa Clara Valley is the center of the beet and bean interests. I worked two weeks this fall stacking bean straw on the Orchard Farm ranch at Saticoy. There were 400 acres in beans, 200 acres in corn, 200 in alfalfa, a fine lot of hogs. The ranch cleaned up net $22,000.

All these ranches draw their water for irrigation during the dry season from streams which have their source within the watershed of the reserve. The Ventura, Santa Paula, Sespe, and Pini rivers are examples. By overstocking the range with cattle the headwaters of the Pini have already been seriously affected. The cattle have so trampled and destroyed the grasses and shrubs that when the winter rains come there is no surface vegetation to restrain them and they rush down in a mad flood to the sea. Again, forest fires, started in some instances by stockmen and in others by campers, have swept across the west end of Pini Mountain range. When the timber is once burnt off a fine canyon like Reges becomes a barren water course.

That is only a specimen of the letter which also refers to other places. I am satisfied that more care ought to be used for the protection of the forest reserves, and if the appropriation is not large enough that larger appropriations ought to be made if we are really to preserve the forest reserves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the amendment reported by the committee will be disagreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 74, line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-four" and insert "thirty-seven;" and in line 12, before the word "dollars," to insert "eight hundred and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

General expenses, Bureau of Forestry: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to experiment and to make and continue investigations and report on forestry, forest reserves, forest fires, and lumbering; to advise the owners of woodlands as to the proper care of the same; to investigate and test American timber and timber trees; to seek, through investigations and the planting of native and foreign species, suitable trees for the treeless regions; to collect and distribute valuable economic forest-tree seeds and plants; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in practical forestry and in conducting experiments and investigations in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and for collating, digesting, reporting, illustrating, and printing the results of such experiments and investigations; for the purchase of all necessary supplies, apparatus, and office fixtures; for freight and express charges, and traveling and other necessary expenses, $337,860, of which sum not to exceed $10,000 may be used for rent. And the employees of the Bureau of Forestry outside of the city of Washington may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, without additional expense to the Government, be granted leaves of absence not to exceed 15 days in any one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 74, line 18, to increase the total appropriation for the Bureau of Forestry from $291,860 to $375,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Chemistry," on page 78, line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen;" and in line 22, after the word "sirup," to insert "of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That $15,000 thereof shall be used exclusively for the purpose of investigating, determining, and reporting the proper treatment and process in order to secure uniform grade and quality of first-class table sirup, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Soils," on page 81, line 8, to increase the appropriation for general expenses of the Bureau of Soils from $130,000 to $195,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 10, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Soils from $172,480 to $237,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, line 21, after the word "dollars," to strike out "shall" and insert "may in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture;" so as to make the clause read:

General expenses of entomological investigations: Promotion of economic entomology; investigating the history and habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, horticulture, and arboriculture; ascertaining the best means of destroying those found to be injurious, including an investigation into the ravages of the codling moth and of the cotton-boll weevil and boll worm, with a view of ascertaining the best methods of their extermination; investigations in apiculture; investigations of the damage to forests and forest trees by insects; purchase of chemicals, insecticide apparatus, and other materials, supplies, and instruments required in conducting such experiments and investigations; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; freight and express charges, and necessary traveling expenses; rent of building; for office fixtures and supplies, telegraph and telephone services; gas and electric current; preparing, illustrating, and publishing the results of the work of the division, $12,000 of which shall be immediately available, $65,500, of which amount not to exceed $10,000 may in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture be expended for silk investigations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, line 8, to increase the appropriation for general expenses of biological investigations from $28,000 to $33,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, after line 8, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to move or transport elk or other game animals presented to the Government or owned by it, and to fence, maintain, feed and care for them on forest reserves or other public lands, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, line 14, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of Division of Biological Survey from $45,850 to $51,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, line 4, to reduce the appropriation for the salary of one editor, who shall be Chief of the Division of Publications, from $3,000 to $2,750; and in line 19 to reduce the total appropriation for salaries in the Division of Publications from $29,320 to $29,070.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 11, to reduce the total appropriation for the maintenance of Division of Publications from $229,320 to $229,070.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 13, before the word "of," to strike out "Division" and insert "Bureau;" in line 14, after the word "of," to strike out "division" and insert "bureau;" in line 15, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" in line 16, after the word "of," to strike out "division" and insert "bureau;" in line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-six" and insert "forty-seven;" and in the same line, before the word "hundred," to strike out "nine" and insert "four;" so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Statistics, salaries: One Statistician, who shall be chief of bureau, $3,500; 1 assistant statistician, who shall be assistant chief of bureau, $2,200; 3 clerks class 4, $5,400; 4 clerks class 3, $6,400; 5 clerks class 2, $7,000; 8 clerks class 1, $9,600; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each, $10,000; 4 clerks, at $840 each, $3,360; in all, $47,460.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 1, before the word "of," to strike out "Division" and insert "Bureau;" so as to read "Bureau of Statistics."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, in line 13, after the word "Provided," to strike out "That the monthly crop report, issued on the 10th day of each month," and insert:

That monthly crop reports based upon returns to the Department to the 1st day of the month upon which the returns are issued shall be issued as soon as possible thereafter, but not later than the 8th day of the month, and.

Mr. PROCTOR. That amendment is withdrawn, Mr. President.

Mr. BATE. I want to say that that is an amendment which I offered in committee. I think it a good one and that very likely it ought to be retained. The provision in the Agricultural appropriation act of last year is the same as this, with the exception of the time. There it was provided that the report should be made on the 10th day of the month, and this provision makes it the 8th. This was assented to by the Secretary of Agriculture when it was presented to him as an amendment by our committee. I am not revealing any secret in saying that. Since then, however, the Secretary has found that he can not carry out the law without having an additional sum of $20,000, as it will require more clerical and other assistance. He has given his reasons for it, and I think probably we had better let it rest as the law now is.

I want to say further that some of the commercial exchanges in the country have telegraphed us that the provision would operate badly. The object I had in proposing the amendment was simply to lessen the time within which there might be, if any were so disposed, jugglery in cotton, grain, etc., from the time the reports were to come in until the time they were made public, and I think the amendment is on that line. But inasmuch as it will cost, as the Secretary says, $20,000 at least, and inasmuch as the exchanges in the country have telegraphed us that the provision will not operate well, I agree that it shall be withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in line 21, before the word "shall," to strike out "it" and insert "these reports;" in line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ninety-four" and insert "one hundred and nine;" in line 25, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty," and on page 89, line 1, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "$5,000 of which sum shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

General expenses, Bureau of Statistics: Collecting domestic and foreign agricultural statistics; compiling, writing, and illustrating statistical matter for monthly, annual, and special reports; special investigations and compilations; subscriptions to, and purchase of, statistical and newspaper publications containing data for permanent comparative records; maps and charts; stationery supplies, blanks, blank books, circulars, paper, envelopes, postal cards, postage stamps, office fixtures, telegraph and telephone services, freight and express charges, including employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and necessary traveling expenses: Provided, That the monthly crop report, issued on the 10th day of each month, shall embrace a statement of the condition of the crops, by States, in the United States, with such explanations, comparisons, and information as may be useful for illustrating the above matter, and that these reports shall be submitted to, and officially approved by, the Secretary of Agriculture before being issued or published, $109,200, of which sum not more than $50,000 shall be expended for salaries in the city of Washington, D. C., $5,000 of which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 4, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Division of Statistics from $141,160 to $156,660.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 24, to increase the appropriation for general expenses of the Division of Foreign Markets from $6,500 to $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, line 1, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of Division of Foreign Markets from $15,000 to $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, line 16, after the word "periodicals," to insert "and for the employment of additional assistance in the city of Washington and elsewhere, when necessary, for traveling expenses;" in line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" and, in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That section 3648 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to the subscriptions for publications for the Department of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay in advance for any publications for the use of his Department.

So as to make the clause read:

General expenses for Department library: Purchase of technical books of reference, technical papers, and technical periodicals necessary for the work of the Department, and for expenses incurred in completing imperfect series, for binding periodicals, and for the employment of additional assistance in the city of Washington and elsewhere, when necessary, for traveling expenses, and for library fixtures, shelving, library cards, and other material, $10,000: Provided, That section 3648 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to the subscriptions for publications for the Department of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay in advance for any publications for the use of his Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 1, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of library, Department of Agriculture, from $18,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 9, after the word "books," to insert "necessary scientific and other publications;" so as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses, Department of Agriculture: Purchase of stationery, blank books, necessary scientific and other publications, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, matting, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Miscellaneous," on page 92, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "ten;" and in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-seven" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

Agricultural experiment stations: To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," and to enforce the execution thereof, $810,000; $40,000 of which sum shall be payable upon the order of the Secretary of Agriculture to enable him to carry out the provisions of section 3 of said act of March 2, 1887, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 93, line 21, to increase the appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain an agricultural station in the Hawaiian Islands, etc., from $12,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 2, to increase the appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain an agricultural experiment station in Porto Rico, etc., from $12,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 12, to increase the appropriation for agricultural experiment stations from $801,000 to $810,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 23, to increase the total appropriation for agricultural experiment stations from $801,000 to $810,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 95, line 22, before the word "those," to strike out "and" and insert "than;" and on page 96, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the laws as affecting irrigation and the rights of riparian proprietors and institutions relating to irrigation and upon the use of irrigation waters, at home or abroad, with especial suggestions of better methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture than those in common use, and upon plans for the removal of seepage and surplus waters by drainage, and upon the use of different kinds of power for irrigation and other agricultural purposes, and for the preparation, printing, and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation, including employment of labor in the city of Washington or elsewhere; and the agricultural experiment stations are hereby authorized and directed to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out said investigations in such manner and to such extent as may be warranted by a due regard to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States and Territories as may be mutually agreed upon, and all necessary expenses, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "$3,000 of which sum shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

Public road inquiries: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to the system of road management throughout the United States; to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making, and the best kind of road-making materials in the several States; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the chemical and physical character of road materials, for the pay of experts, chemists, and laborers, for necessary office fixtures, supplies, apparatus, and materials; telegraph and telephone service, traveling, and other necessary expenses, and for preparing and publishing bulletins and reports on this subject for distribution, and to enable him to assist the agricultural colleges and experiment stations in disseminating information on this subject, $40,000, $3,000 of which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 97, after line 3, to insert:

Such amount of the urgency deficiency appropriation for the Bureau of Animal Industry for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, approved December 22, 1902, as may remain unexpended on June 30, 1903, is hereby reappropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, to be used for the purposes mentioned in the act by which the appropriation was made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. ALDRICH. What has become of the statehood amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments have all been agreed to except the first one.

Mr. PROCTOR. With the exception of the first amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was passed over, and of course has not been agreed to. The other amendments have all been concurred in in the Senate.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask that the bill be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the bill be informally laid aside. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

SAFE-KEEPING OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 7301) to futher provide for the safe-keeping of public money, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the bill has heretofore been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read at length. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

The Secretary of the Treasury may accept as security for the safe-keeping of public money deposited with national banking associations, as herein authorized, the deposit of bonds of the United States, bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of any State of the United States, or any legally authorized bonds issued for municipal purposes by any city in the United States which has been in existence as a city for a period of twenty-five years, and which for a period of ten years previous to such deposit has not defaulted in the payment of any part of either principal or interest of any debt authorized to be contracted by it, and which has at such date more than 50,000 inhabitants as established by the last national, State, or city census, and whose net indebtedness does not exceed 10 per cent of the valuation of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last preceding valuation of property for the assessment of taxes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. In line 23, page 2, after the word "bonds," I move to insert "not including street-railway bonds."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "bonds," in line 23, page 2, it is proposed to insert the words "not including street railway bonds."

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Rhode Island please give us the reason for the amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is to exclude street railway bonds.

Mr. BACON. I understand that, but why?

Mr. ALDRICH. There are certain financiers who believe that street railway bonds have not yet secured such a status as to entitle them to be used for this purpose. I do not share to any great extent that apprehension, but in order to meet the criticisms that have been made in that direction the committee thought it more desirable to exclude them from use for this purpose.

Mr. BERRY. I understood the Senator from Rhode Island was going to explain the provisions of the bill. I desire to make some remarks on it, but I should like to hear his explanation of the bill first.

Mr. QUARLES. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that his amendment, in my judgment, would be more properly inserted after the word "company" than after the word "bonds."

Mr. ALDRICH. I think perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin is right. Let the amendment be inserted after the word "company," in the same line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "company," in line 23, page 2, it is proposed to insert "not including street railway bonds."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, after line 12 on page 3, to insert the following:

The United States shall have a lien on all assets of banks in which public moneys are deposited from the time of deposit, for the repayment of the same on demand of the Treasurer of the United States as aforesaid; but the securities deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury for the safe-keeping of such moneys shall be sold before the said lien is enforced and the proceeds applied to the discharge of said lien to the extent of the proceeds of sale.

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee desire to modify the amendment. I move to strike out the word "all," in line 13, and insert "the current."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. In line 14 I move to strike out the words "from the time of deposit."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I understood that the Senator from Rhode Island desired to make an explanation of the bill. I should like to hear it before I make the remarks I intend to make on the bill. If he is not going to submit an explanation, I will make my remarks now.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator goes on, let me call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the provision at the bottom of page 2. This bill provides for certain classes of securities which are supposed to be, I take it——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is a very important matter, and I hope the Senator from Maine will speak louder, so that we may hear him.

Mr. HALE. This bill provides for certain classes of securities to be accepted by the Government as collateral and as insuring the safety of deposits by the Government. They are United States bonds, State bonds, municipal bonds, or—the first-mortgage bonds of any railroad company which has paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than ten years previous to the deposit of the bonds.

Is that meant to be a continuous arrangement—every year?

Mr. ALDRICH. Continuous from the time of deposit, of course.

Mr. HALE. Then there would be no objection to putting in the word "continuous."

Mr. ALDRICH. Where would the Senator suggest that it be put in?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Let it read "for a continuous period of not less than ten years previous to the deposit of the bonds."

Mr. BACON. I am sorry to interrupt the Senator from Maine, but we really desire to hear what he says. He speaks to the Senator from Rhode Island, and it is impossible for us to hear him.

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly should not object to that amendment. I think that is the meaning of the provision as it stands.

Mr. HALE. I think myself it is the meaning, but I think everything of this kind is a departure, and hereafter there will be some complications and there will be some losses by the acceptance of these securities. The best of husbandry on the part of the Treasury Department can not prevent that; and every provision here for the acceptance of these bonds to insure the Government security ought to be beyond any doubt as to what it means.

My suggestion is that when you come to deal with the first-mortgage bonds of a railroad company—and this class of bonds, as everybody knows, covers an immense amount——

Mr. KEAN. It is not very large now.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Jersey indicates that it is not very large now, but it seems to me that the total of the class of railroad bonds covered by this provision must be large. I suggest that in line 23, where it reads—

The first-mortgage bonds of any railroad company which has paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly on its entire capital stock for—

There be inserted the word "continuous;" so as to read:

for a continuous period of not less than ten years previous to the deposit of the bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggests to me that what I have in mind might come in after the word "regularly;" so as to read:

Dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly and continuously on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than ten years previous to the deposit of the bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is satisfactory.

Mr. HALE. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). The Senator from Maine offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "regularly," in line 25, it is proposed to insert the words "and continuously."

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I should like to hear that read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri ask that the entire bill as amended be read?

Mr. VEST. No; merely that part of it which has just been amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks that the section of the bill as amended be read.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to hear the entire bill read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the reading of the entire bill as amended. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill as amended.

Mr. McCOMAS. Is the bill now being read for amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is being read for the information of the Senate at the request of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McCOMAS. And is still open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill as amended, and continued to the end of line 20, on page 3.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask if the Secretary has read the bill correctly when he read "the current assets of banks?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been amended in that respect.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill was amended on the suggestion of the committee.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon. I suppose an inquiry is not now in order as to what is the reason for the amendment, but I should like to ask it later.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill as amended; which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5153 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5153. All national banking associations, designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be depositaries of public money, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary; and they may also be employed as financial agents of the Government; and they shall perform all such reasonable duties, as depositaries of public moneys and financial agents of the Government, as may be required of them. The Secretary of the Treasury may deposit in such designated depositaries public money received from all sources, and shall require such depositaries to give satisfactory security, as hereinafter authorized, for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money so deposited with them and for the faithful performance of their duties as financial agents of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury may accept as security for the safe-keeping of public money deposited with national banking associations, as herein authorized, the deposit of bonds of the United States, bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of any State of the United States, or any legally authorized bonds issued for municipal purposes by any city in the United States which has been in existence as a city for a period of twenty-five years, and which for a period of ten years previous to such deposit has not defaulted in the payment of any part of either principal or interest of any debt authorized to be contracted by it, and which has at such date more than 50,000 inhabitants as established by the last national, State, or city census, and whose net indebtedness does not exceed 10 per cent of the valuation of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last preceding valuation of property for the assessment of taxes; on the first-mortgage bonds of any railroad company, not including street-railway bonds, which has paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly and continuously on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than ten years previous to the deposit of the bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury may accept the securities herein enumerated in such proportions as he may from time to time determine, and he may at any time require the deposit of additional securities, or require any depositary to change the character of the securities already on deposit. National banking associations having on deposit public money shall pay to the United States for the use thereof interest at the rate of not less than 1½ per cent per annum, such rate to be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury; and all public moneys in any depositary shall be payable on demand upon the draft of the Treasurer of the United States. The United States shall have a lien on the current assets of banks in which public moneys are deposited for the repayment of the same on demand of the Treasurer of the United States as aforesaid; but the securities deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury for the safe-keeping of such moneys shall be sold before the said lien is enforced and the proceeds applied to the discharge of said lien to the extent of the proceeds of sale."

SEC. 2. That the 2 per cent bonds of the United States authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, that shall be issued to provide the funds appropriated by the third section of said act, and for the other expenditures authorized therein, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges given by law to the 2 per cent bonds issued under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900, and any national banking association having on deposit any of the 2 per cent bonds issued under the provisions of said act approved June 28, 1902, shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such bonds, in lieu of the taxes imposed on notes in circulation by section 5214 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 3. That section 3 of the act approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, retain in the general fund of the Treasury national-bank notes received in the ordinary course of business or presented to the Treasurer of the United States as hereinbefore provided, and pay out such of them as may be fit for circulation for any of the obligations of the Government, excepting only the principal and interest of the public debt."

Mr. WELLINGTON. I understand the bill has been read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was read at the request of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. WELLINGTON. And is unanimous consent required for its further consideration?

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been taken up by a vote of the Senate, but by unanimous consent it was read at the request of the Senator from Tennessee for the information of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the matter was passed over, and did not at that time attract my attention, but I desire now to ask the Senator from Rhode Island the purpose of the amendment on page 3, in line 13, striking out the word "all" and inserting "the current." I presume, of course, there is a good reason for it, but it does not occur to me, and I desire to have the information.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say to the Senator that after the bill was reported, it was called to the attention of the committee that the language in the form in which the bill was reported would perhaps, by creating a lien upon all assets at the time of the deposit, prevent a bank from carrying on its current business; that is, disposing from day to day of assets which it might have on hand. The purpose of the amendment is that this lien, whenever it applies, after demand is refused, shall apply to the then existing assets of the bank, and shall not prevent the disposition of assets from day to day in the ordinary course of the business of the bank.

I am not sure whether the criticism is a good one, but I am inclined to think it is, and the committee thought it best in any event to change it so that the lien should apply upon the assets of the bank at the time the lien was created.

Mr. BACON. In the use of the word "current," as I understand, it is designed to designate the assets which may then be in the possession of the bank unpledged to any other demand?

Mr. ALDRICH. Exactly.

Mr. BACON. I would ask the Senator whether he thinks that would be an adequate security?

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly, from the fact that at the present moment there is no lien at all upon the assets. This is an additional security beyond the deposit of bonds or other——

Mr. BACON. The present law has no such provision in it?

Mr. ALDRICH. The present law has no such provision. This is an additional security to the Government.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. HALE addressed the Chair.

Mr. HALE. In line 19——

Mr. LODGE. I think I was going to make the same suggestion. I suggest that in line 19 to strike out "State, or city."

Mr. HALE. That is the suggestion I made to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senators speak a little louder?

Mr. HALE. The suggestion I before made to the Senator was that in line 19, page 2, the words "State, or city" should be struck out, so that the census provided for will be the regular, established national census.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Then I move it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 19, page 2, after the word "national," it is proposed to strike out the words "State, or city," so as to read, "national census."

Mr. HALE. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the meaning of the word "date" in line 17, on page 2.

And which has at such date—

What date is that? Does it mean to refer to the date of the transaction, the deposit, or to the census?

Mr. ALDRICH. The time of deposit.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The time of deposit?

Mr. ALDRICH. The time of deposit. It is intended to.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Does it so read?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let us see.

And which for a period of ten years previous to such deposit has not defaulted in the payment of any part of either principal or interest of any debt authorized to be contracted by it, and which has at such date—

That is, the date of deposit. It seems to me clear enough.

Mr. MCCOMAS. If it is clear to the Senator, that is enough. I want to make a further suggestion to the Senator. I think he intends to include county as well as city bonds where they are within the qualifications and will meet the requirements of his language here. Why not say in line 12:

Issued by any county, or issued for municipal purposes—

Then in line 17, after the word "which," insert "county or city;" so that it would read:

And which county or city has at such date more than 50,000 inhabitants.

Counties are ordinarily quasi public corporations, but they are not municipal corporations as such. There are many county bonds which are as much prized as Government bonds, and would be fully as good security and would be based on more property. I therefore ask the Senator whether he would accept an amendment in line 12 so that it would read " to be issued by any county or city," and in line 17 to insert the words "county or city?" The requirement that the county or city should have a population of more than 50,000 would remain.

Mr. LODGE. A city of 50,000 contains ample population for city bonds. A county of 50,000, it seems to me, would be pretty inadequate. It might contain small scattered towns without much property.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The assessment of a county of 50,000 would be from twenty to forty million dollars. Most of the counties in the United States run from twenty to forty million dollars.

Mr. LODGE. That is true in parts of the United States.

Mr. MCCOMAS. It is true pretty well over the United States. The counties will show an assessed valuation of that amount.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that if it is important to include counties, although the committee did not think it was, we might insert the word "county" at the end of line 12, so that it would read:

authorized bonds issued for municipal purposes by any city or county in the United States which has been in existence as a city or county for a period of twenty-five years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 12, at the end of the line, after the word "city," insert "or county;" and at the end of line 13, after the word "city," insert "or county."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I had understood from the remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas address himself to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BERRY. No, I am addressing myself to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then in the absence of objection the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland will be agreed to. It is agreed to. The Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, when I objected to the consideration of this bill one day last week the Senator from Rhode Island said he was anxious to make an explanation of it and suggested that we did not have time, as that was Saturday evening. I have twice asked him this morning to explain it, and he has declined to do so; at least, he has not done so. I would have been glad to hear him state the objects and purposes of the bill before I make such remarks in opposition to it as I desire to present.

Mr. ALDRICH. The reason why I have not complied with the Senator's request is because I have been constantly interrupted by Senators who had amendments to suggest.

Mr. BERRY. Very well; if the Senator will make the statement now, I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is very kind indeed. The reading of the bill, I think, was concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the bill proposes to make a very few simple changes in existing law. I will state these propositions seriatim, and I think the mere statement of them will be sufficient.

Mr. TELLER. If we can have a little less noise in the Chamber, perhaps we may hear the Senator. We can hardly hear him over here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order, and conversation will cease on the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was about saying that I would explain briefly the changes which the bill proposes in existing law. They are few in number and simple in terms.

The first change is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise the same control over the receipts from customs that he now exercises, and has for forty years, over all the other receipts of the Government, those from internal revenue and from other sources.

Under the national-bank act of 1864 the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to designate certain national banks as Government depositories and to deposit therein all the receipts of the United States, except those from customs. Under this act each succeeding Secretary of the Treasury has deposited public money in national banks, and the amount so deposited has never, I think, been less than eight or ten million dollars, and it has varied from this sum upward, and in one instance, in 1879, it reached the sum of $279,000,000. This large deposit grew out of the refunding transactions of 1876-77-78-79.

The fact that the Secretary was not permitted to use customs receipts in this way has been productive at times of evil results. The Secretary of the Treasury has often been obliged, under existing law, to take from the current transactions of the country from one to three or five million dollars daily and to lock the money up in the Treasury of the United States, where it could not be used except to pay for current appropriations made by Congress.

Of course, we would all be glad to reach a condition where the receipts of the Government would always just equal its expenditures. We have never been able quite to reach that point. This Congress has reduced the annual revenues of the country $100,000,000, and we still have a surplus. Just what that surplus will be at the end of the year it is impossible at this moment to say.

But it is important, in the view of the committee, that this surplus, whatever it is, should not be placed by law where it could not be used and when its removal was liable to be very injurious to the business interests of the country. The Independent Treasury act of 1846 is obsolete, and the provisions which enforce this injurious retirement should be modified.

Now, the excess of the receipts over the expenditures is greater in certain months than in others. They are greater in the fall of the year—in the months of September, October, and November—just at a time when the demand for money is the greatest for moving crops and when a stringency in the money market is almost certain to occur.

Therefore, this withdrawal of money at that time has been doubly injurious, and for that reason we think that the same rule ought to apply to receipts from the customs service that applies and has applied for forty years to all the other receipts of the Government.

I will state that this idea of depositing the surplus funds in banks has existed, with but one interruption, from the foundation of the Government. It has been evident always that the Treasury could not afford to arbitrarily contract the currency and to lock up a large amount of the money of the country where it could not be used. Out of this fact grew the act of 1864, which followed in effect what had been the practice under various acts from the foundation of the Government.

The next change made by the bill in existing law is to authorize a different class of securities to be used.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me, as he is going from that branch, to ask him a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly. I shall be very glad to answer any question at any time.

Mr. BACON. I ask it in order that I may get the views of the Senator, who doubtless represents also the views of his committee. Should there not be some provision, in view of this contemplated enlarged deposit, by which there should be an impartial distribution—not absolutely impartial, but approximately an impartial distribution—of the deposits in various sections of the country? In other words, ought there not to be some provision which can prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from exercising any partiality by the deposit of an undue amount either in any particular section or in any particular city or in any particular bank, reference of course being had to the volume of business?

I do not mean by this inquiry that there should be an exact fractional proportion according to population in different sections, but, having due regard to the business of the country, ought there not to be some provision in the bill by which there would be secured approximate impartiality in the deposit of this money?

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee, of course, considered the question raised by the Senator from Georgia, but they were unable to discover any method by which that distribution could be enforced. There have been in the past, as the Senator from Georgia very well knows, a great many discussions as to the best method of securing a fair distribution of the Government funds in the different parts of the country. I think every Secretary of the Treasury has distributed the public money as widely as he could and as judiciously as he could, taking into consideration, of course, the amount of business as well as the population.

Mr. BACON. Oh, of course; that is proper; but I want to ask the Senator's attention to the statements which have appeared from time to time in the press of the country as to the very large deposits in some particular bank, so that there was not an impartial distribution even in the same community. The Senator doubtless recalls the fact that such charges have been made, not only of a slight difference, but of a most extravagant partiality in favor of some one particular bank in some particular city to the exclusion, if you please, of other banks in the same city.

Mr. ALDRICH. I know that criticism has been made, but I think it has been ascertained upon an investigation of the facts that the criticisms were not well founded; that is, that no locality had, considering its business, at any time an excess of deposits. I also think that there was no excess found in any one institution. That is my recollection of the fact. I know the Secretary of the Treasury has transmitted information to Congress upon the subject on several occasions.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of the present Secretary, of course.

Mr. ALDRICH. I refer to the Secretary who recently retired. There were allegations that he had deposited or permitted to be deposited in certain banks in the city of New York more money than they were entitled to by reason of their importance or their business, but I think the allegations were shown to have been unfounded.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator recognize that it would be practicable for the committee to bring in an amendment on the subject? I am not going to offer any amendment myself, but I call it to the attention of the Senator because I think it would be better for him to frame it in case he recognizes the propriety of it. Does not the Senator recognize the propriety of it? Does not the Senator recognize the entire practicability of a general provision which, while it should not be too rigid, would at the same time lay an obligation upon the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute the deposits with some degree of impartiality, having due regard to the business of the several localities? Does not the Senator think that a general provision of that kind, while it would not be sufficiently rigid to embarrass the Secretary, would at the same time lay upon him an obligation which would be generally recognized by the public, and under which those who desire deposits would be in a better position to secure what they might be entitled to under the law?

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee believe that the provisions which I shall reach next in the course of my explanation will secure the result which the Senator seeks without adopting a rigid rule in regard to it.

Mr. BACON. I do not want a rigid rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should be very glad if the Senator from Georgia would suggest some amendment which in his judgment would control the distribution within reasonable limits. I should be very glad to see that done.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that if the bill is not disposed of at this time I will endeavor to draft such a provision and submit it to him. I have no pride in the matter.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think myself it would be possible to adopt any other rule except the discretion of the Secretary, but I shall be very glad to see what the Senator has to propose.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I have been out of the Chamber, and I desire to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island what portion of the bill is under consideration, if any?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have just explained the first provision of the bill, which proposes to place under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury the receipts from customs duties as well as the other receipts; and I was just about to explain the changes which are to be made in the existing law in regard to the nature of the securities.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator if it would not be well to allow all the national banks to become depositories in view of the fact that an interest charge is made for the deposits farther on in the bill? Should it be left entirely to the Secretary of the Treasury to say what banks shall be depositories?

Mr. ALDRICH. I know of no other rule that can be adopted. All national banks are eligible to be named by the Secretary of the Treasury as Government depositories. That is a law which has remained unchanged for forty years.

Mr. BURTON. I know it is left to the discretion of the Secretary to select the banks as the law now is.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator would not desire to have the Secretary obliged to keep a deposit in every national bank in the United States. It does not seem to me that that would be desirable.

Mr. BURTON. I have not given the matter full consideration. I am only asking for information. I am not in any sense opposing the measure, the Senator will understand.

Mr. ALDRICH. It would not seem to me to be desirable or possible to name all the national banks of the United States as Government depositories in terms.

Mr. BURTON. But since a charge is to be made for the deposits, the point I want to have considered further, I will say, is whether it is not proper that all national banks should be made depositories.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not myself think so. That would not be my principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside.

Mr. BERRY. I object to that. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] wants to make a speech on this bill, and I object to laying it aside for the purpose of proceeding with the bill which has been under consideration, except so far as the Senator's speech goes. But if it is intended to continue the debate further than that, then I object.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, I shall not resist the objection, but I give notice that at the earliest time——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. I make no request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood a request to have been made.

Mr. BERRY. I understood the request to be that the bill be informally laid aside.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did make that request, but the Senator from Arkansas objected.

Mr. BERRY. I objected; and I said that if the Senator simply wanted to finish his speech I would not object until after that time, but I did object if the debate was to be extended beyond that.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Arkansas seems to think that other Senators are entitled to more courtesy than I am myself, and therefore I shall not contest it.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the Senator's remark is wholly unjustified. I said the Senator from South Carolina had the floor on the statehood bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. He has the floor on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have it on both.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator has the floor on both bills, I do not see how I can very well contest his right to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing to give way to the Senator to conclude his speech, but I think it is apparent from the indications here that it will be discussed further. If the Senator from Rhode Island wants to complete his speech so that it can get in the RECORD and Senators can study it, I am perfectly willing that that shall be done.

Mr. BERRY. I said I had no objection to the Senator from Rhode Island finishing his speech.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it is the pleasure of the Senate that I shall finish the statement I was making, I will proceed.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope Senators will not object to the Senator from Rhode Island proceeding.

Mr. BERRY. I do not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber, and I wish to inquire what is the parliamentary condition. Has the statehood bill been laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business, the bill known as the statehood bill, has just been laid before the Senate. The Chair hears no objection to the request made that the Senator from Rhode Island shall proceed with his remarks, the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

Mr. QUAY. Until the Senator from Rhode Island has completed his remarks?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Until he has completed his speech. The Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was about to say that the second change in existing law proposed by the bill is in regard to the nature of the securities which may be deposited to insure the safety of the public money. Under existing law the security is required to be bonds of the United States, and otherwise. Just what the words "and otherwise" mean has been always more or less a question of dispute. The Secretary of the Treasury some time last fall decided that under that language he could accept State and municipal bonds, and he did so to the extent, I think, of $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. I am not sure about the exact amount.

This relieves any Secretary from responsibility by providing that hereafter any bonds of the United States and bonds of any State and a certain class of municipal bonds and a certain very limited class of first-mortgage railroad bonds may be accepted as security.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. What is the reason for limiting the bonds of cities to cities of 50,000 inhabitants? What good reason can be urged that the bonds of a city of 50,000 inhabitants, when based upon the valuation of its property, are any better than the bonds of two cities of 25,000 inhabitants each, based upon the same valuation of property? I should like to ask the Senator why it would not be perfectly safe to leave the character of the bonds to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee believed that no securities should be accepted by the Secretary of the Treasury that would not be considered to be first-class securities in any market of the country, and that would not be salable in any market in the country.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Would not the bonds of a city of 25,000, if found to be legally good and to be based upon a proper valuation, be just as valuable and just as salable as double the amount issued by a city of 50,000?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator will agree with me that there might be a city anywhere in the country of 25,000 inhabitants whose bonds would be just as good as those of a city of a million or two millions, but they would not have the same currency away from the local institutions that the bonds of the larger city would have.

We have taken as the basis of our action the savings-bank laws of the States which have immense deposits in savings banks, and our purpose was to place the safety of the public money deposited in these banks beyond any question whatever, so that there should be no criticism here or anywhere else as to the nature of the securities.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It seems to me that that is rather legislating against the negotiability of the bonds of the smaller cities by not putting them upon a par with the bonds of larger cities.

Mr. ALDRICH. They can not be placed upon a par with the bonds of larger cities in the money markets of the country. That is impossible. We can not by legislation say that the bonds of a city of 25,000 population shall be as good as or better than those of a city of 1,000,000 inhabitants.

Mr. MCCUMBER. But pardon me again. Could not the Secretary of the Treasury take that matter into consideration, and, with his knowledge of the character of the bonds, is it not safe to allow him to determine the question whether they are valuable and whether they would not be proper security? Suppose there is one city of 48,000 and another city of 50,000, why should the bonds of the city of 48,000 be unimportant and not be received by the Secretary of the Treasury, while the bonds of a city of 1,000 or 2,000 more inhabitants may be received, although they may not be in reality as good bonds?

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee were anxious as far as possible to limit the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. We are constantly—I will not say assaulted—but we are constantly criticised, the Republican party has been, and the Administration of Mr. Cleveland was, by a great many people throughout the United States, for exercising the wide discretion which must necessarily be devolved upon the man who has charge of the Government finances, and the committee were extremely anxious that this discretion should be carefully guarded and limited so that there could be no question whatever about its exercise.

Mr. McCUMBER. In this proposed law do you limit the county bonds? Are they limited to the number of inhabitants of the county?

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, yes; to 50,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. In counties?

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, yes.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I wish to suggest to the Senator that I think he is mistaken in supposing that bonds of smaller cities, cities of less than 50,000, cities of 25,000 or 10,000 or less than that, can not find ready sale in New York. I think it is true that a number of the smaller cities have issued bonds and found ready sale for them in New York. Cities of not only 25,000, but of 10,000, or even of 5,000, have issued bonds and found ready sale for them in New York.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is undoubtedly true that a town or village might be able to sell its bonds to a customer in New York; but if the customer who bought them should go out and try to sell them in open market he would, in my judgment, find a very limited demand.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator a question which is rather on the other line. Is the question of population really the question which should determine the fact of a city's bonds being security for deposit? Ought there not to be something else? There are large cities with poor credit, and the Senator will note that in this measure there is no reference whatever to the solvency of the city.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon. If he will read further down he will see there is just that provision.

Mr. BACON. Oh, I understand that that is in the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. He will note that the indebtedness shall not exceed 10 per cent of the valuation.

Mr. BACON. That may be all true. Of course that had not escaped me, because that is a common provision. In fact it is a constitutional provision in my State. So the matter had not escaped my attention. It is nevertheless a fact that in spite even of that, by reason of poor financiering or otherwise, the question of the population of a city does not determine the question as to the valuation of the bonds.

Now, the object of my question is not for the purpose indicated by the questions already asked of the Senator, of having the bonds of smaller towns recognized as available as security, but viewing it from a much broader standpoint, here we are engaged in a most important matter, the designation of what security shall be sufficient to justify the Government in depositing its money with the holders of those securities, and it does seem to me that the simple question of the population of a city is not that which should determine the value of its securities.

As to railroad bonds, I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is a different rule by which to determine the value of securities. It is not the length of the road or the amount of its capital; it is the record it has made in its ability to declare dividends.

It does seem to me that if the door is to be thrown wide open for the acceptance of the bonds of any city, there ought to be something more than the simple question of population. I should like to have the Senator to explain why is it that in the matter of railroads the question of the value of the securities is determined by the record which the road has made in the declaration of dividends. There is no reference whatever to the size of the road, or the length of the road, or the amount of its capital, or the amount of the issuance of bonds as compared with its capital. In the case of a city the only restriction whatever is the fact that its debt shall not exceed a certain proportion of its total taxable value.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator has not read the bill. At least that would be the suggestion I should make.

Mr. BACON. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think if the Senator will read the provisions of the bill in lines 14, 15, and 16 he will find that exactly the same rule is applied to cities that is applied to railroad companies. I will say that the language here used is taken from the New York statute in regard to the securities which may be taken for investment by the savings banks in New York, the limit of 100,000 being contained in the provisions. The committee believed that they were perfectly safe in every way, and conservative.

Now, if the Senate disagrees with the committee in that respect and wants to liberalize this bill in that direction, that is for the Senate to determine and not the committee. The committee believe they have gone as far as we can in this direction in making the public money absolutely safe. The committee have also——

Mr. BURTON. May I interrupt the Senator again to ask a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. In the proposed amendment on page 3, I see that the deposit would be a lien on the assets of the bank. Would it be a prior lien to other depositors? If so, the language is unnecessary.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly, it will be a prior lien to other depositors, but not a lien as against what is called a paramount lien, which the Government has for security for circulating notes. It will be a lien secondary to that.

Mr. BURTON. I know, but would it give the Government a prior lien or a paramount lien on the deposits or on the assets of the bank as against ordinary depositors?

Mr. ALDRICH. It certainly would for the balance, for the deficiency which might exist after the securities deposited had been sold, for the balance of the indebtedness, whatever that was. The Government of the United States would have for the first time in the history of the country a lien upon the assets of the bank.

Mr. BURTON. And a prior lien, too, to an ordinary deposit?

Mr. ALDRICH. To an ordinary deposit.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator think it is right to give the Government that advantage?

Mr. ALDRICH. Acting for the Government of the United States, yes.

Mr. BURTON. Well, it has the advantage of having the security.

Mr. ALDRICH. I believe that it is incumbent upon us, if we are to deposit the surplus revenues of the United States in national banks, that we should throw around that deposit every possible safeguard which we can devise.

I say, standing here representing the Government of the United States and the safety of its funds, that we ought to have, after the security has been exhausted, a lien on the assets of the bank superior to that of ordinary depositors. That is my judgment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I was going to say, if I may be permitted by the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. But I will not interrupt the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to suggest that it was hardly fair for me to give way to have the Senator from Rhode Island complete his statement, and——

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall try not to occupy much more time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not finding fault with the Senator from Rhode Island, but I was finding fault with my colleagues who are discussing the merits of this bill on various propositions which can come up to-morrow just as well as to-day, because I understand that we are to have no vote on the bill to-day, and if Senators will let the Senator from Rhode Island complete his statement in explanation, whatever he fails to explain to-day he can explain to-morrow or whenever the bill comes up again. I am anxious to proceed with my little essay on the race problem, and should be glad if my brethren would permit the Senator from Rhode Island to finish his explanation and then let me get the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will try not to yield again to prolong the discussion.

Mr. President, the next change suggested by the committee is a provision that banks having deposits of public money must pay interest at the rate of not less than 1½ per cent per annum, the rate to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury. This is an entirely new provision in this bill.

Heretofore on these deposits, ranging, as I have already stated, from $10,000,000 to nearly $300,000,000, no bank has ever paid one cent of interest to the United States Government for the use of this money, and the committee believe that if they are to retain these privileges it is nothing more than fair that they should pay something to the Government for the use of the money, approximately such compensation as a private depositor would be entitled to receive under the same conditions.

Of course at the present moment, when banks are required to deposit bonds of the United States to the full extent of deposits for security, there is not very much profit to a bank in having a Government account; and most of the banks, especially banks in the rural and semirural districts, are not owners of Government bonds and therefore can not use them for this purpose. The result has been that such banks—in fact, banks all over the country—have had to borrow bonds from their owners and pay a rate of from one-half to 1½ per cent for the use of the bonds. That certainly is not a healthy condition.

We believe that this provision for allowing other securities to be used in place of the United States bonds will distribute the deposits over various parts of the country. For instance, a bank in Georgia which is entitled, perhaps, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to have a deposit of $100,000 might not have $100,000 in Government bonds and might not be willing or able to buy them at the present price and still have the transaction remain profitable. It might not be able to secure United States bonds for this purpose, while it might take the bonds of the city of Savannah or of the State of Georgia or the first-mortgage bonds of some railroad company under this provision.

Therefore, the purpose of this bill, and its effect necessarily, would be to liberalize the law so far as the national banks throughout the country are concerned, enabling them to secure some part of the Government deposits.

The committee believe this provision for paying interest is a very desirable and a very wise one. If it goes into effect the revenue from this source paid upon deposits will be two and a quarter millions of dollars a year. I understand that, of course, it will continue so long as the deposits remain. As I have stated——

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of this bill a question, and that is, whether the last section of the bill is intended to make national-bank notes a legal tender in payment of all of the debts of the Government except the bonds?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not; neither are the silver certificates, which are paid out under similar conditions. I will take that up when I get to that branch of the subject, which will be very soon.

The next provision to which I will call attention is section 2 of the bill, which simply gives to the 2 per cent bond that shall be issued for the construction of the isthmian canal the same right in reference to the currency as the present 2 per cent bonds, which are issued under the act of 1900.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. I call the attention of the Senator to these words:

> And pay out such of them as may be fit for circulation for any of the obligations of the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not got to that yet, but I will in a moment, if the Senator will permit me. I am now discussing——

Mr. PETTUS. I wish to ask if it is necessary to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out any money that he has in hand that the debtor is willing to receive when he may do that without this authority, and why is the provision put in here if it is not to be made obligatory upon the creditor to take it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator probably was not able to hear my statement that I had not yet reached that section. I was simply making a statement in regard to the second section.

Now, in reference to the third section and in answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], I will say that all that is done by that section is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to do what I think he can do now, but which he thinks he can not do under the terms of the third section of the act approved June 20, 1874. The new section merely says that the Secretary of the Treasury shall use national-bank notes when received into the Treasury precisely the same as he uses any other form of money; that he can take them in and pay them out for indebtedness. It was not intended by the committee, and I do not understand that that is the effect of the language used, to require anybody to take them who does not want them. They are not legal tender, as the Senator from Alabama well knows, and it is not intended to increase one particle their legal functions or the purposes for which they can be used, and in my opinion the language employed in the bill does not do that.

Under existing law silver certificates are received and when redeemed are reissued and used by the Government in the payment of its debts. Now this simply provides that national-bank notes may be used at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury in the same way and to the same extent as silver certificates are now used. It was not intended—and I think a reasonable construction of the law does not carry that intention—to make them legal tender or to give to them any rights or privileges except those which they now have.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. In a moment. As suggested to me by the Senator from Nebraska, this simply provides that national-bank notes shall be received as current funds and paid out as current funds for the ordinary expenses and obligations of the Government.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator now permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator state what benefit will be derived from this provision and why is it desirable to enact it? How will it be different from the existing law, and what advantage will come to the country and to the Treasury Department from it?

Mr. ALDRICH. The advantage that will come to the country from it is that under existing law these notes are sent rapidly into the Treasury Department in times of stringency, redeemed, sent to the bank, and canceled, and the effect is to reduce arbitrarily and often unwisely the volume of currency of the country. That, I think, neither the Senator from Arkansas nor myself is desirous of doing. In other words, under the machinery of the existing law an absolute contraction of the currency is brought about, when the country itself and all of its interests would be better served by an expansion. Does that answer the Senator's question?

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] asks me whether under this bill the Secretary of the Treasury could select a bank in a small town as a depository of Government funds. He certainly could and he certainly would in case there was a demand for it. There could be and would be no discrimination in that respect, and I think a Secretary of the Treasury who should show any discrimination under this bill if it becomes a law would be properly liable to impeachment, because this power is not given to him for the purposes of favoritism or discrimination.

I have tried to explain the various provisions of this bill as clearly as I can. It is simply a business proposition; it is not an enlargement of the currency; it is not entering an untried field, but it is doing in a simpler way what is done now.

There is no question of partisanship involved in this proposed legislation. In the Committee on Finance it was taken up and considered by the Democratic and Republican members alike, with a view of making a few small changes that we could all agree upon in the existing system and in existing conditions, without going into any of the vexed questions which divide parties or divide sections or which would arouse a discussion of economic questions which would be interminable.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator if he will accept an amendment which I desire to offer, and which I shall now read, to be inserted at such place in the bill as he may think proper?

Mr. TILLMAN. Apparently this discussion is going to continue all the evening, and I feel obliged to insist that Senators will either allow the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to get through, or I will take the floor on this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I appeal to the Senator from South Carolina to allow the Senator from Georgia to read the amendment he proposes to offer.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator can do that to-morrow. I do not want to be discourteous to the Senator, but it is not fair to me to keep me whipsawed in this way, when I had an understanding at the time the Senator from Rhode Island rose to take the floor that he would make an explanation, and if that did not explain, we would ask him to explain his explanation to-morrow. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I should have been through before now if the Senator from South Carolina had not interrupted me. I will now read the amendment which I propose to offer as an additional section:

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress at the beginning of each session thereof the amounts deposited under the authority of this act during the twelve months next preceding, the name of each bank in which a deposit has been made, the amount of money thus deposited with each bank, the length of time during which such deposits were made, and in each instance a statement in detail of the bonds accepted as security for said deposit and the interest paid thereon to the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that is a very wise amendment, and I suggest that it be put in the bill wherever it will be appropriate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the bill is to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; but I will first ask, Mr. President, as the copies of the bill are exhausted in the document room, that there may be ordered a reprint of the bill as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] just now?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So that that amendment will appear as accepted?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the bill may be reprinted as amended. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to know what is the order of business before the Senate, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The omnibus statehood bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I want the floor on that, but I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] for a moment.

Mr. QUAY. I wish, Mr. President, to ask unanimous consent of the Senate that on to-morrow at 2 o'clock p. m., without further debate, the vote be taken on this bill, on the amendments now pending, and on those that then may be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock the final vote be taken on the pending bill, on the amendments then pending, and on all amendments then offered, without further debate. Is there objection?

Mr. NELSON. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota objects.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday I was discussing the political aspect of the race question. I wish to add a few facts and observations to that phase of the subject before I proceed with the broader and more important phases of this complex problem.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Before the Senator proceeds with the discussion of this matter I desire to call attention to page 2513 of the RECORD, lest by my silence I may be taken as acquiescing in the remark of the Senator from South Carolina yesterday, which is printed in the RECORD on the page to which I have referred. I could not well catch all that he said, and so I did not notice the statement to which I am about to refer in his speech yesterday. I hope it will not be necessary for me to take the floor again on this question, and for that reason I ask to correct the statement now. This language was used by the Senator from South Carolina in speaking of the Indianola people:

> They have created a little post-office of their own, personal and private, at which the mail thus brought, for white people only, mark you.

The portion of this sentence which I desire to correct is that part which states that the mail is to be brought for white people only. While I have no direct testimony on this point——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me there, I was merely giving my general impression in regard to the status of Indianola from a statement or an interview or something which I saw in the Washington Post. If I am in error I shall be glad to to be corrected, for I would not do the good people of that community wrong in one single instance. If they are bringing the mail for all the citizens of Indianola without regard to race, color, or previous condition, I am glad to know it.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. As I understand, there has been an arrangement made by the white people of Indianola for the carrying of the mail twice a day to Heathman and for bringing the mail from Heathman to all the people of Indianola, and that this carrying and bringing of the mail is for whites and negroes indiscriminately; that any person in Indianola who has any mail to go can send it by this messenger to Heathman and have it posted there; that any mail that comes to Heathman for any person living in Indianola, or who before the abolishment of the post-office received his mail at Indianola, is brought from Heathman by this messenger; that they have a white postmaster, a lady who lives in Indianola, and attends to this as if it was a regular post-office, except that it does not have any sign or anything to indicate that it is a United States post-office.

There is another thing, if the Senator from South Carolina will indulge me for a moment, to which I should like to call attention. The Senator from South Carolina seems in this language to take issue with the position I took in my discussion of the legal aspect of this case——

Mr. TILLMAN. From what page of the RECORD is the Senator now about to read?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Page 2512. On that page the Senator from South Carolina said:

> The Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Mississippi had some disagreement about the mass meeting. I do not pretend to determine which of them has the better part of the law in this matter. I suppose our Constitution guarantees the right of the people to assemble peaceably and petition for redress of grievances. The question might arise, and I have no doubt it would arise in the mind of a lawyer, whether that meant a petition to somebody which was local or to a central authority, the President or the Congress, or to some one having power to redress grievances. I will leave out that question.

Mr. President, this right to assemble and petition is not a right that is granted by the Constitution of the United States, as I tried to demonstrate in the speech I made heretofore on this question. The right to peaceably assemble and to consult about our public affairs is a right that existed before the Constitution of the United States existed, a right natural and inherent in every free people.

The first amendment to the Constitution guarantees that this right shall not be abridged, but it does not grant any right that did not exist before. I read from the case of The United States v. Cruikshank et al. the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States delivered by Chief Justice Waite. I did not read extensively from it; but in order that my position may be known on this subject, and because it is better expressed by the Chief Justice than I can express it myself, I will again read it. I will read more copiously from that decision. I read from page 551 of 92 United States Supreme Court Reports. Speaking of this right, Chief Justice Waite said:

> The right of the people peaceably to assemble for lawful purposes existed long before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. In fact, it is and always has been one of the attributes of citizenship under a free government. It "derives its source," to use the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 211, "from those laws whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world." It is found wherever civilization exists.

That is this right to meet, the right of the people to peaceably assemble and consult about their public affairs, and to petition for a redress of grievances, to petition anybody. The Constitution only guarantees that Congress shall not take away this right, so far as it pertains to the right to peaceably assemble and petition for a redress of grievances. The right that existed unlimitedly before is a right that is natural and inherent in all free people and in all republican forms of government, and it is a right which it has never been attempted by Congress or any other authority to abridge so far. So that it is not necessary to invoke the Constitution in aid of this right to peaceably assemble and petition anybody, whether it be the President of the United States or the Congress of the United States, or any part of any department of the United States Government.

The Chief Justice continues:

> It was not, therefore, a right granted to the people by the Constitution. The Government of the United States, when established, found it in existence, with the obligation on the part of the States to afford it protection.

The obligation he is noticing here is upon the States to afford protection to this right to peaceably assemble and petition for the redress of any grievances, and the Constitution guarantees that this right shall be maintained, and that it never shall be abridged.

> As no direct power over it was granted to Congress, it remains, according to the ruling in Gibbons v. Ogden (id., 203) subject to State jurisdiction. Only such existing rights were committed by the people to the protection of Congress as came within the general scope of the authority granted to the National Government.

So that the Constitution does not grant any right to anybody. The Constitution never granted any privileges to the people; the Constitution is merely an instrument delegating certain power and certain authority to the General Government, and limiting the power of the General Government to that which is delegated to them by the Constitution, which is the compact of our Union.

The Chief Justice further says:

> The first amendment to the Constitution prohibits Congress from abridging "the right of the people to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." This, like the other amendments proposed and adopted at the same time, was not intended to limit the powers of the State governments in respect to their own citizens, but to operate upon the National Government alone. (Barron v. The City of Baltimore, 7 Pet., 250; Lessee of Livingston v. Moore, id., 551; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How., 434; Smith v. Maryland, 18 id., 76; Withers v. Buckley, 20 id., 90; Pervear v. The Commonwealth, 5 Wall., 479; Twitchell v. The Commonwealth, 7 id., 321; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 id., 557.) It is now too late to question the correctness of this construction. As was said by the late Chief Justice, in Twitchell v. The Commonwealth (7 Wall., 325), "the scope and application of these amendments are no longer subjects of discussion here." They left the authority of the States just where they found it, and added nothing to the already existing powers of the United States.
> The particular amendment now under consideration assumes the existence of the right of the people to assemble for lawful purposes, and protects it against encroachment by Congress. The right was not created by the amendment; neither was its continuance guaranteed, except as against Congressional interference. For their protection in its enjoyment, therefore, the people must look to the States. The power for that purpose was originally placed there, and it has never been surrendered to the United States.

The right of the people peaceably to assemble for the purpose of petitioning Congress for a redress of grievances, or for anything else connected with the powers or the duties of the National Government—

That is, the right to assemble "for anything else connected with the powers or the duties of the National Government"— is an attribute of national citizenship, and, as such, under the protection of, and guaranteed by, the United States. The very idea of a government, republican in form, implies a right on the part of its citizens to meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs and to petition for a redress of grievances.

Now, the point I want to make is that the people of Indianola had an inherent right—that is what I tried to make plain and intelligible to the Senate—had an inherent right to assemble, as they did assemble, and to appoint a committee of three, as they did appoint a committee of three, for the purpose of obtaining signatures to a petition to the postmaster at Indianola, asking her to resign, and that in doing so they were doing that which they had an inherent and a natural right under our form of government to do; that they did not get that right from the Constitution; that it was a right which existed before the Constitution existed, and that the Constitution had nothing to do with it at all, except if Congress were to undertake to abridge that right in any way, it could not abridge it to the extent which would prohibit the people from petitioning for the redress of grievances; but that inasmuch as Congress never has undertaken to pass any law with respect to it at all, the right to petition this woman was as broad as the right to petition Congress, or to petition the President of the United States, or any other authority; that they had violated no law; that they had done nothing except what they had a constitutional right to do, and that all the people of Indianola had done this, and for doing this their post-office facilities were cut off, and not only their post-office facilities, but the post-office facilities of everybody else who had any post-office business, epistolary correspondence, or any newspaper correspondence, with the people of Indianola; that this post-office did not belong to the people of Indianola alone, but that everybody had an interest in it who had correspondence with any citizen of Indianola; and that when it was broken up it was the breaking up of the post-office facilities of all the people of Indianola and of such people in any other part of the United States, whether in New York, Pennsylvania, Chicago, New Orleans, Memphis, or anywhere else in the United States, as had business correspondence with the people of Indianola.

Now, that is what I was trying to make clear in order to make my position plain and understood.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as I had expressly refrained from undertaking to pass an opinion upon the conflicting and diametrically opposed contentions of my two legal friends, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], I do not see why I should be charged with endeavoring even by implication to side with either. I merely expressed a general idea. Being no lawyer, I can give only a rather vague and indefinite expression of my view. What little law I know I have absorbed. But I still think that whatever the Constitution guarantees must be a part of it, and when the guaranty was that the right to assemble peaceably and to petition for the redress of grievances should not be abridged, I think that that was practically saying, "They shall have this right forever." But the Senator from Mississippi feels that he must make himself clear, and I think everybody understands his contention. I agree with him entirely that it would be splitting hairs to say that the people of Indianola had committed an unlawful act in coming together as they did and setting in motion machinery to give an expression of opinion by the citizens in regard to the post-office.

It is true I quoted yesterday an act which was placed upon the statute books in the reconstruction era applicable to this very condition, and I judge if any action should be brought in the courts to determine whether that act was constitutional, whether any crime, any conspiracy had been organized at this mass meeting, it could be settled. My main desire was to make known my opinion and belief that the President and the Postmaster-General had transcended their authority and had used tyrannical and unconstitutional and illegal methods in dealing with the Indianola post-office as they did.

Now, I am not going to deal in technicalities here, but as the Senator has brought that matter up, I will return to it for a moment to read some expressions of opinion on the part of leading Northern newspapers, leading Republican newspapers, on this subject. First, the New York Tribune, in discussing the general question of negroes holding office, said:

The question of negro officeholding in the South is a difficult one. Many leading negroes believe the negroes better off if they avoid politics. The duty of the Government is to get its business transacted properly and to the satisfaction of the public concerned. The Government can not admit that one citizen's rights are inferior to another's; nevertheless the wisdom of putting a good man where he will not fit, simply to assert the right to put him there, is debatable, and a vote against putting him there does not prove any readiness to reestablish slavery.

Then we have the New York Mail and Express. In discussing this topic it uses this language:

If the country can not afford to see all official opportunity denied to a man because he is colored, it can not, on the other hand, in the least afford to see a candidate put forward, excused, and defended merely because he is colored.

Then we have Harper's Weekly:

The question is: "Shall the military power of the United States be used to force a colored official upon a community against the unanimous protest of its white inhabitants?" If this question be answered in the affirmative, we may have to face a renewal of the civil war.

We doubt the expediency of raising such an issue. We regret to add that there is a trace of vindictiveness and provocation in the course pursued by the Post-Office Department which has compelled the citizens of Indianola to obtain their mail at a post-office 30 miles away instead of at another only 4 miles distant.

Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the inhabitants of Indianola had defied Federal authority—which is not clear, since no threat of violence was made, and Mrs. Cox seems to have resigned her office voluntarily—we doubt the constitutionality of the measure taken by Mr. Roosevelt.

He could, unquestionably, have appointed another negro to the post-office at Indianola and upheld him with the judicial and military powers of the Federal Government.

But where does he get the right to deprive an American community of postal facilities, the cost of which it helps to defray? We sincerely hope that the real, though unavowed, motive of the attempt to discipline the citizens of Indianola is not, instead of being a somewhat belated resolve to enforce rigorously the privileges granted to colored persons by the reconstruction amendments of the Constitution, a bid for the colored vote in certain Northern States where it holds the balance of power.

Does Mr. Roosevelt imagine himself to be a truer friend of the colored race than Booker T. Washington, who has repeatedly advised his brethren to forego officeholding or office-seeking in that section of the country which resents even an approach to negro domination?

I have read those extracts from these exponents of Northern opinion for the purpose of showing that there is a saner view, a more patriotic, a more conservative, and a more just view of the difficulties which beset us of the South than has obtained heretofore.

Discussing as I have been doing the question of motives, and I deal with motives here very reluctantly, but following the thought I have just read from Harper's Weekly as to whether or not the purpose of this new-born zeal, this cold-blooded, calculating, advisedly taken action has any such low motive, I hold in my hand the figures of the last census, giving for each State of the Union the persons of negro descent, together with the number of male persons of voting age. I shall not read it all, but I shall put it in the RECORD as a matter of information to those who wish to make calculations and comparisons and deductions. I will merely call off a few of the States which are doubtful, and let the people judge for themselves whether or not the suspicion which is in the mind of the editor of Harper's Weekly has any foundation in fact.

Maryland has 60,000 negroes of voting age; Pennsylvania, 51,000—I am using round figures only—New York, 31,000; Ohio, 31,000; Illinois, 29,000; New Jersey, 21,000; Kansas, 14,000; West Virginia, 14,000; Delaware, 8,000.

Mentioning these States for the purpose of directing attention to them specially, I will give the full table:

Let any student of politics take the statistics of the last election, or the last three elections, and place alongside of these figures the majorities which were obtained, and judge for himself. I have not added up the figures, but I stand here to say that it is perfectly clear to my mind that the presence in the border States on both sides of the old Mason and Dixon line, the Ohio and the Potomac, of negroes in the numbers that are shown to exist, proves that there are some six or seven hundred thousand of them, all told, and that it is the influence, the coercion, if I may use the term, of this small fragment or fraction of the race that appears to be behind the President's policy. In other words, 800,000 negroes, if there be so many, are coercing 50,000,000 white people at the North to deal with 17,000,000 white people at the South in the interest of 8,000,000 ignorant negroes down there.

I might comment with some degree of dissatisfaction upon this unpleasant fact; I might ask whether blood is thicker than water; but I do not wish to dwell too long upon the political side of this issue. I wish, however, to call attention to this fact: If you should call the roll of every man who wore the gray in the unfortunate civil strife which ended thirty-seven years ago—that gallant band of heroes who went to death for what they believed to be their rights—I am absolutely certain you could not get a response from 200,000 of them. The rest have "crossed over the river" and are resting with Jackson and Lee. This being true, it occurs to me to ask you Senators from the North when the war is to terminate, or is it ended now? This generation of Southern men had nothing to do with the bringing on of that war. The generation which fought the war were not responsible for slavery. Slavery is dead and gone and the Union is restored. I know of no man in the South who would restore slavery if he could. The whites were emancipated from a thralldom of ignorance and debasing conditions, which was as much to their advantage as was the emancipation of the negroes.

But consider, if you please, how many more generations are to come and go, confronted as they are by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, which were put upon the Constitution as the reaping of the fruits of the unfortunate fratricidal strife, and say whether they are to be forever in the grasp of a political machine which ignores the fact that they are Anglo-Saxons as well as you; that they have that same feeling of caste which you have in a less degree, but that their sentiments and prejudices and inherited feelings of whatever character are ignored, and in several of the States they are constantly face to face with a condition without example in history, where a minority of white men are forever facing a situation in which their liberties and civilization may be jeopardized by the negro vote.

We have had three race problems in the nation's history. By common consent, North and South, we have acted upon the policy that there were no good Indians except dead ones. We have pushed the red man backward, westward, ever, ever westward, until by the overpowering, thronging white population the red men have been practically destroyed and the small remnant of those great tribes which once owned this continent are now corralled upon their reservations, without hope and without liberty or "equality." A few thousand, mainly mixed blood, are being given in the Indian Territory some little recognition of the obligations of this Government in parceling among them in severalty the lands set apart for those who had been transported across the Mississippi. In a few years those lands will also be owned by the palefaces.

Next we had the Chinese coming in from the Pacific, swarming over to develop our mines and build our railroads. But as soon as the competition between the Celestials and the Americans became sharp a universal demand arose that the Chinese should be excluded, and notwithstanding the fact that they are superior in every respect to the negroes, they have been kept out.

The negro alone of the three races other than the white with which we have had to deal as a people has excited a sympathy born of sentiment and his condition of slavery and has produced a conflagration the recollection and the magnitude of which will be a memory to be regretted by this people during the balance of their history, and history has no record of so grand and great a struggle in all its annals.

What has this race question, this negro question, cost us as a people? Speaking in general language, I want to remind you that from the very best sources of information I can get the cost in men—brave, gallant, heroic, patriotic men, the very flower of our country on both sides—was a half million or more. In money and property the least estimate is five billion dollars. Of the blood and the tears and the misery, the horrors of civil strife, I shall make no mention. But when we recall the facts which I have just repeated to you as to what this race problem has already cost us, and shall dwell as I shall do later on upon the conditions now confronting us, I ask you to meet me upon the same plane of patriotism, of race pride, and of civilization, and not to fall into the dirty cesspool of partisan politics. Ignorance and fanatecism were responsible for the Civil War. Have we not statesmanship to avoid the more direful struggle which threatens?

Returning to the thread of my story, because I want to get all the evidence in, for I am going to try this case just as impartially as if I myself was before the bar of God, I want to read you an extract from a letter published by the President of the United States on the 27th of last November. It was written in answer to two letters which he had received from some gentlemen in Charleston discussing a Federal appointment. Mr. Roosevelt in this communication uses the following language:

> The great majority of my appointments in every State have been of white men. North and South alike it has been my sedulous endeavor to appoint only men of high character and good capacity, whether white or black. But it is and should be my consistent policy in every State, where their numbers warranted it, to recognize colored men of good repute and standing in making appointments to office. These appointments of colored men have in no State made more than a small proportion of the total number of appointments. I am unable to see how I can legitimately be asked to make an exception for South Carolina. In South Carolina, to the four most important positions in the State, I have appointed three men and continued in office a fourth, all of them white men—three of them originally Gold Democrats—two of them, as I am informed, the sons of Confederate soldiers. I have been informed by the citizens of Charleston whom I have met that those four men represent a high grade of public service.
> I do not intend to appoint any unfit man to office. So far as I legitimately can I shall always endeavor to pay regard to the wishes and feelings of the people of each locality; but I can not consent to take the position that the door of hope—the door of opportunity—is to be shut upon any man, no matter how worthy, purely upon the grounds of race or color. Such an attitude would, according to my convictions, be fundamentally wrong. If, as you hold, the great bulk of the colored people are not yet fit in point of character and influence to hold such positions, it seems to me that it is worth while putting a premium upon the effort among them to achieve the character and standing which will fit them.
> The question of "negro domination" does not enter into the matter at all. It might as well be asserted that when I was governor of New York I sought to bring about negro domination in that State because I appointed two colored men of good character and standing to responsible positions—one of them to a position paying a salary twice as large as that paid in the office now under consideration; one of them as a director of the Buffalo exposition. The question raised by you and Mr. —— in the statements to which I refer is simply whether it is to be declared that under no circumstances shall any man of color, no matter how upright and honest, no matter how good a citizen, no matter how fair in his dealings with all his fellows, be permitted to hold any office under our Government. I certainly can not assume such an attitude, and you must permit me to say that in my view it is an attitude no man should assume, whether he looks at it from the standpoint of the true interest of the white man of the South or of the colored man of the South—not to speak of any other section of the Union. It seems to me that it is a good thing from every standpoint to let the colored man know that if he shows in a marked degree the qualities of good citizenship—the qualities which in a white man we feel are entitled to reward—then he will not be cut off from all hope of similar reward.
> Without any regard as to what my decision may be on the merits of this particular applicant for this particular place, I feel that I ought to let you know clearly my attitude on the far broader question raised by you and Mr. ——, an attitude from which I have not varied during my term of office.

I have read this letter, Mr. President, for the purpose of giving to you that broad and high view which the President maintains. I want to be entirely just and fair to him. I have no purpose by implication or indirection to attack his motives, but I want to show how superficial is the view, how little and small and infinitesimal is the knowledge behind such a view.

First opening up the evidence, I want to say here and now that the facts I can bring to bear are overwhelming which go to prove that the masses of the Northern people have no more use for the colored man at close quarters than we have. If you occupy this attitude by reason of caste, the fact that you have not been brought in contact with negroes and you know nothing about them, still, let that number be ever so small, whereever there are any of them this race prejudice or caste feeling exists.

I have here a letter which appeared in the Washington Post a few days ago from a South Carolinian, a colored man by the name of Samuel H. Blythewood, describing his treatment and the environment to which he is subjected in the city of Philadelphia.

> SIR: I am a colored man, a mechanic by trade. There is nothing in the line of a house in wood that I can not make. I can build all the stairs, windows, make the sashes, blinds, and doors. I can build a house from the ground up and turn the keys over to the owner completed. I can draw the plans, make the blue prints, make the specifications, and give estimates. Yet I am debarred from employment on account of my color. The prejudice in this city is strong against me, much stronger than in the place I came from. No one wants me because I am a colored man. Why is this? I am 37 years old. I drew the plans of the colored church on Tasker street, above Twentieth. My name is on the corner-stone. I built the State Colored College of Orangeburg, S. C., and I have built cottages in Orangeburg and for the mayor of Beaufort, S. C., but still I am debarred from employment in Philadelphia.

SAMUEL H. BLYTHEWOOD.

I have here a copy of the Hartford Daily Courant of March 28, 1902. It relates the pitiful condition of a well-to-do colored man by the name of Edwards, who owned a home immediately adjoining a school. The school board wanted his land to enlarge the playground or something. They bought it, and then he tried to go somewhere and buy another home. Here, in brief, is his experience:

MR. EDWARDS'S HOME—HAVING SOLD IT, HE HAS TROUBLE GETTING ANOTHER—HARD LUCK OF A RESPECTABLE COLORED MAN IN TRYING TO BUY OR RENT A HOME FOR HIS FAMILY.

William B. Edwards is one of the best known colored men in Hartford, a modest, retiring man, intelligent and self-respecting. He is employed by the Hartford Fire Insurance Company as messenger and janitor, and is well known to nearly everyone in the city as the janitor of the Center Church. Just now he is looking for a home for himself and family, and has hard luck in buying or renting.

Mr. Edwards is at present living at No. 44 Wadsworth street, where he has made his home for the past twenty years, but having sold the house to the South School district, whose property it adjoins, he has been asked by the district committee to vacate as soon as possible; and this he is trying to do, but without signal success. To begin with, Mr. Edwards does not think he has been used quite fairly by the district in the purchase of the house. It seems that some years ago Mr. Baker, then chairman of the district committee, approached him with the statement that the district would probably want his house some time. Nothing happened under Mr. Baker's administration in the way of getting the property, however, and not until Gen. H. C. Dwight was chairman did negotiations for the house begin. Mr. Edwards was asked what he considered his property worth, and after consultation with Gen. William H. Bulkeley as to the probability of the district's ever buying it, he fixed the figure at $6,500.

Another property directly in the rear of Mr. Edwards's lot is owned by Alonzo Edwards, who is a white man. This lot faces on Hudson street, and adjoins the school property very much as Mr. Edwards's property does Mr. Edwards says he considered that his property was worth more than the Alonzo Edwards property, as it has a frontage of 90 feet and a depth of 153 feet, while the Hudson street property has a frontage of only 60 feet. At a meeting of the district held two years ago General Dwight reported that the Edwardses, both the colored and the white Edwards, wanted exorbitant prices for their property, and that the district ought not to buy at the figures. The proposed purchase was dropped, and just before the June meeting of the district in 1901 Mr. Edwards was again approached, this time by Mr. Hansling, of the committee, as to what he would sell his property for. This time Mr. Edwards referred the matter to ex-Governor Bulkeley, but there was no satisfactory action taken by the meeting.

Mr. Edwards says that late in the fall of 1901 a real estate agent approached him on the matter and worried him a great deal about it. Finally he went to General Dwight and said that he wished to sell directly to the district and not through an agent. He was asked his lowest figure and said it was $5,500. The reason the figure was placed so low was that he was nervous and worried and had family afflictions and he agreed to let it go. At the same time he expected that he would be used as well as his white namesake. A meeting of the district was called and it was voted to buy both lots. No papers had been passed before he ascertained, as he says, that the district was going to pay Alonzo Edwards $7,000 for the Hudson street lot. He was worked up over this and consulted friends, saying that he did not think the district was using him right, and suggesting that he withdraw from the bargain. His friends advised him to stick to it and the house was sold to the district at the figure named. The house, which Mr. Edwards had bought of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company twenty years ago, had passed from his hands. To his suprise he read in a few days that the Alonzo Edwards property had been bought by the district for $8,000. "Then I kicked," he says. But it was too late.

But this is but the beginning of the story. Mr. Edwards immediately set himself about getting another home. Consulting Fred M. Lincoln, real estate agent, he got track of a new house down on Adelaide street and made a bargain to buy it for $3,250, the trading being done by the agent. The sum of $250 was paid to bind the bargain, and when the deed was prepared Mr. Edwards inspected it, and the owner of the property, a Mr. Kerns, came into the office of Francis Chambers to sign the document. Mr. Edwards was not in evidence, and left the office, supposing that the matter was adjusted. In the evening of last Thursday, however, some one met him on the street and told him that Kerns would not sign because the proposed purchasers were colored. He went to Mr. Chambers's office at once and Mr. Kerns was there, and the conversation between Mr. Chambers and Mr. Kerns was something like this:

"Did you not agree to sell this property through Mr. Lincoln to any respectable person?"

"Yes."

"You did not tell the agent not to sell to a Chinaman?"

"No."

"Nor to a Japanese?"

"No."

"You didn't tell Mr. Lincoln to sell to a Yankee and to no one else?"

"No."

"You didn't tell him not to sell to a negro?"

"No; I told him to sell to a respectable person; that's all."

"Well," said Mr. Chambers, "I have known Mr. Edwards many years and he is as respectable as any man of my acquaintance."

Just then Mr. Edwards stepped inside the office and Mr. Kerns "scooted out," to use Mr. Edwards's language, and Edwards has not seen him since. Mr. Lincoln returned the bargain money of $250 to Mr. Edwards and that transaction was closed, unfortunately for Mr. Edwards.

Another phase of the story was yet to develop. Mr. Edwards saw an advertisement in one of the evening papers to the effect that three tenements were to rent at No. 35 Sumner street, with the further information "to colored people only. Large families no objection." He thought the name of the street sounded rather large, but he investigated and found it to be the house of A. Goodman. He said to Mr. Goodman that if he really meant to have colored people live in his house he would like to rent it, but cautioned him that it would be to the disadvantage of the property for him to do so, owing to the prejudice against color. Mr. Goodman replied that the neighbors had found fault with his children and insulted them, and that he was going to let them live beside colored people and see how they would like that. Mr. Edwards assured him that his family was respectable, and that the only difficulty was that their skin was black.

He thought the rent was secured, and was congratulating himself on getting it, when on Monday Mr. Goodman appeared in distress, saying that the bank was going to call in its loan on the property. Mr. Edwards said that under those conditions he would not take the rent. Mr. Goodman assured him that if he could arrange the matter the rent was still his. Mr. Edwards told him the mistake he made was in putting such an advertisement in the papers. It had set the neighbors wild, and they had made a move against him. He did not suppose there would have been any objection to his living there, but "colored families only with large families" was something the people would resent. There the matter rests, and Mr. Edwards is still hunting for a comfortable rent for a respectable family of color.

Next I have a copy of the Boston Globe of June 2, 1902. I will read the headlines and merely print and insert, with the permission of the Senate, two articles. The first is as follows:

FEELING IS VERY BITTER—HOWARD AND MARSHALL GET SCANT COURTESY—COLORED BOYS AT EXETER ARE TREATED BY STUDENTS WITH CONTUMELY—RESENTMENT SHOWN OVER THEIR WITHDRAWAL FROM THE ATHLETIC TEAM.

EXETER, N. H., June 1, 1902.

It is the general belief in town that if Howard and Marshall, the colored boys until recently in the squad, were good enough to represent the school at the meet they were good enough to eat at the training table, and their resentment of insults by leaving the team is generally commended.

In student circles, however, feeling against them is very bitter, and in the march of the school from the campus after the meet they were treated with contumely.

This was in direct variance with the Exeter spirit. Twice has a colored man been elected class-day orator, and colored men, notably Jones, the star tackle, Lawton, Syphax, and Marshall, now a Boston lawyer, have repeatedly represented Exeter on elevens, nines, and track teams, eating at training tables.

It is almost a certainty that Howard would have won the mile in yesterday's meet, and that Marshall would have taken third place in the shot put. He was a substitute on last fall's eleven and was given an "E," being the single man who did not play in the Andover game to gain the distinction.

An unintentional omission was made in yesterday's report of the meet. McGovern and Marshall, of Andover, who tied for second place in the high jump at 5 feet 7¼ inches, should have been credited with breaking a dual meet record, 5 feet 6 inches, established in the 1900 meet by Connor, of Exeter, and Botchford, of Andover.

The same Boston paper contains the following:

WOMAN ATTACKED—PLUCKY GIRL ESCAPED FROM NEGRO—MISS MARY R. GREEN DEFENDED HERSELF BRAVELY—WAS IN HER UNCLE'S GROUNDS AT WORCESTER—BURLY RUFFIAN TRIED TO DO HER VIOLENCE—FLED, BUT WAS CAPTURED A FEW HOURS AFTERWARDS.

WORCESTER, June 1, 1902.

Mary R. Green, 28 years old, a niece of Andrew H. Green, of New York, was attacked by a burly negro on the grounds of her uncle, Martin Green, of Green Hill farm, this afternoon, and escaped from his clutches only after a most terrible struggle.

The man was drunk at the time, and to his condition as well as to the plucky fight put up in defense is due the escape of the young woman. She fought her assailant for five minutes, and then, frightened by her calls for help, the negro fled to the woods. He was captured three hours later.

The news of the assault did not spread, and few knew of it outside of the police, to whom it was reported at once, but this evening, when the news was circulated, there was great excitement.

Miss Green is a daughter of the late Dr. Samuel F. Green, for many years a missionary to India. She lived with her uncle, Martin Geeen, on his summer estate. She went to the Sabbath school of the Central church and was returning soon after 1 o'clock when she was attacked.

Green Hill is situated on the east side of Lincoln street, in the north part of the city, and the Green estate embraces many acres. The entrance gate is at the end of Green lane, which extends from Lincoln street, and Miss Green had entered the grounds to walk up to the house.

She had not gone far when she saw the man walking down the avenue from the house, but she paid no attention to him, as it is not uncommon for strangers to stroll through the grounds.

She was about to pass him when he rushed upon her and violently threw her to the ground. The young woman struggled and called for help, but this seemed only to exasperate the miscreant, who tore her clothing and held her to the ground.

When he became alarmed he started to run and was soon lost in the woods, but it was known that he had gone toward Lake Quinsigamond, and in that direction pursuit was taken. The bicycle squad and all the day force of the police department were ordered to search for the negro.

Sergeant Hill and Patrolmen Power, Thayer, Jackson, Knight, and Streeter were sent through the woods in the vicinity. Power and Thayer got a clew which led them in the direction of Bloomingdale, and there, near the engine house, they came upon him. He submitted quietly to arrest.

He had the appearance of just getting over a spree. One of the officers says he denied having committed any assault, but admitted having met a woman somewhere and taking hold of her. Even this much he would not admit later, but maintained that he had not committed any assault.

Miss Green and her uncle called at the police station, and the young woman positively identified her assailant.

The prisoner gave his name as William Johnson, and said he was 40 years old. He said he was born in Maryland and later moved to Harrisburg, and from there came to this city last fall. He was a laborer, and said he worked for a contractor named Barnard, whose other name he could not give.

Johnson is known to a few people in that vicinity of Hanover street. He roomed in a house on that street, near Arch street, and his quarters were frequently the scene of carousals, so his neighbors say.

The condition of Miss Green is not alarming. It was feared at first that she would suffer from the shock, but her uncle thinks she will be able to appear against her assailant in court to-morrow morning.

These may be isolated cases; they may not reflect the general feeling and sentiment of the Northern people or conditions there; but there are every day facts coming out going to show my contention to be true that the more the Northern people find out about the negro the less use they have for him. To use the expression which I have used once before, they love him according to the square of the distance. He is, they think, an admirable voter in the South and in the border States, where his vote counts for so much. Under the Constitution he is entitled to all the rights and privileges of other citizens, and many millions of unthinking Americans are drifting along that road absolutely ignorant and oblivious of where it is going to lead.

I will not spend more time to prove that there is prejudice and caste feeling among the Northern people in regard to the negro. If anyone wants to dispute it, let him produce his evidence and then I will be ready with some more facts to back up my position.

Right here, I think it very well to remind Senators that in this District we have the most striking example of the calm, considerate judgment of the leaders of the Republican party that the negro's ballot is a menace to good government. We had in this District in 1867 an enactment which gave the citizens, white and black, some control over local affairs and the levying of taxes and their expenditure. After five years the experiment had proven so absolute a failure that Congress, to save itself or save the city of Washington, felt constrained to repeal the act, and to institute the form of government we now have, which is as autocratic as that of Russia or China, or any other absolute government.

Why was it right or necessary to take the ballot from the negro here, and to take along with it the ballot of the white man, and yet it is right and proper to continue the partisan cry that there must be a free vote and a fair count in the South, and that every negro man should cast his ballot and have it counted, without regard to intelligence, or character, or anything else?

I leave those who are ready to defend this policy now, if there be any left, to specify. We have reached a period in the evolution of this question in which Northern sentiment has come to concede and to acknowledge that there was a blunder and a crime, or a mistake bordering on crime, when the negroes were enfranchised in the manner they were.

We have seen Southern State after Southern State exercise every possible ingenuity under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to reduce the number of negro voters and to minimize the danger from that source, and without protest almost from the North. Therefore I feel that we are approaching a period when this sane and patriotic view will obtain throughout the country, when the best thought North and South will come together and consider what can be possibly done for this colored brother, this man in black, and at the same time not jeopardize and destroy the white people who live where the negroes are thickest.

I shall approach that subject from the view point of a man living in a State where there are 235,000 more negroes than there are white people, and some 40,000 more negroes of voting age than there are white people. There is one other State similarly situated—Mississippi, while throughout the South the proportion of negroes to whites varies. There are over a million negroes in Georgia, and a majority of white voters of 30,000 or 40,000, and so on throughout the long catalogue. The table which I have prepared and which I have inserted will facilitate the examination by any person interested in it.

Now, the most striking phrase in the President's letter, the one which appeals strongest to the sentiment of everybody North and South, is that he is unwilling to "shut the door of hope and of opportunity in the face of a worthy and competent colored man." On first blush there is not a man alive who is a man, who has any of the elements of breadth and depth and liberality and Christianity and humanity, who would not agree with that sentiment.

Did it ever occur to those of you whose feelings are enlisted in that contention that in opening the door of hope and opportunity to this colored man you might be shutting it in the face of his white brother? We in my State for eight long years lived with the door of hope closed on us and the lock fastened by bayonets, keyed together by a bayonet, while rapine and murder and misgovernment and anarchy and every other thing which ought not to have been ran riot, with a travesty on government, an abomination in the sight of God and man presiding over the destinies of the Palmetto State.

We had the door shut, and it seemed to have closed for all time. We pried it open by force because we had to pry it open or suffocate. Even now the sunshine which comes to us from God's blue sky has up there the shadow of a negro with a ballot in his hand. We have exercised, as I said, our ingenuity and all the ability as lawyers and statesmen which we could under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to minimize and reduce the evil and to push it away from us. But it remains.

As chairman of the committee on suffrage in the constitutional convention, which I had struggled for four years as governor to have called for the express purpose of dealing with this question; as a man born on a slave plantation where there were one hundred of them belonging to my family; with experience, some little insight into the horrors of the war, and with a full knowledge of what happened during the reconstruction era when the carpetbag vampires and their negro dupes were running riot in South Carolina, I approached it with all the solemnity of a man resolved by every possible scheme that we could devise to take the ballot from every negro alive, if that had been allowed. But we could not do it, because the fifteenth amendment barred the way.

The fifteenth amendment prohibits any discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition. Therefore we had the simple and only alternative to provide for an educational qualification, with an elastic provision which enabled the illiterate whites to be registered, because we were unwilling to take the ballot from those of our own blood, some of them the best men we have, who had lost the opportunity to get an education in their youth because they were fighting.

We found after we had completed our work that there were some 15,000 negroes who were then ready to register. I suppose that the number has increased since by education to 25,000, while the number of whites who were able to register is something like a hundred thousand. So that for the time we have a breathing spell. We are at ease for the moment. But the relief is only temporary.

Along with the instrument which deprived the negroes of the right to vote because they could not read and write we placed in the constitution a provision which levied a 3-mill tax for public schools, and so again there was no discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition. Therefore, the history of education in South Carolina for the last twenty-five years before the new constitution and since has been that there are more negro children in our public schools than there are white.

While we have opened the door of hope for a while to the whites, and shallow thinkers are ready to suppose that a solution of the race problem in the South has been reached, every man who can look beyond his nose can see that with the negroes constantly going to school, the increasing number of people who can read and write among the colored race, with such preponderance of numbers as they have, will in time encroach upon and reach and overbalance our white men. And then what will happen? Will the door of hope be closed again on us by submitting to negro domination? Take it home and sleep on it, and then give me your answer.

Why can we not afford it? This brings a long train of witnesses to show the difference between the Caucasian and the colored race, and to demonstrate to the satisfaction of every student of ethnology and history that the Southern white men can not, without absolute destruction to their civilization, submit to it.

I will begin in Washington. This city has been the very hotbed, the hothouse, where the effort to elevate the African and educate him and humanize him and civilize him and Christianize him has had its best development, or, rather, the effort has had unlimited money and encouragement. It has been right here under the ægis of the American eagle, in sight of the Dome of the Capitol, and what are the results?

I have here one of the most interesting, instructive and valuable compilations that I suppose has ever been written by anyone. I did not know it was in existence until I began the investigation of this subject. I should like for Congress to have it printed as a document if the consent of the owner of the copyright could be obtained, and let every student of our political and sociological and ethnological conditions get hold of it. It is termed "The Race Traits and Tendencies of the American Negro," a publication by the American Economic Association, volume 11, printed in 1896 by Macmillan & Co., New York. It is written by Frederick L. Hoffman, statistician to the Prudential Insurance Company of America; and in order that the astounding facts which this gentleman marshaled, purely as a scientific investigator, may receive such due credence as they appear to me to be entitled to, I will read briefly an extract from his preface. I want to introduce Mr. Hoffman to the Senate. I never knew of him until a few days ago myself.

At the commencement of my investigation, especially in regard to longevity and physiological peculiarities among the colored population, I was confronted with the absence of any extensive collection of data free from the taint of prejudice or sentimentality. Being of foreign birth, a German, I was fortunately free from a personal bias which might have made an impartial treatment of the subject difficult. By making exclusive use of the statistical method and giving in every instance a concise tabular statement of the facts, I believe that I have made it entirely possible for my readers to arrive at their own conclusions, irrespective of the deductions that I have made.

During the course of my inquiry it became more and more apparent that there lie at the root of all social difficulties or problems racial traits and tendencies which make for good or ill in the fate of nations as well as of individuals. It became more apparent as the work progressed that, in the great attempts at world bettering, at the amelioration of the condition of the lower races by those of a higher degree of culture and economic well-being, racial traits and tendencies have been almost entirely ignored. Hence a vast sum of evil consequences is met as the natural result of misapplied energy and misdirected human effort.

He speaks here in regard to the city of Washington as follows:

In Washington the colored race has had exceptional educational, religious, and social opportunities. Even in an economic sense the race is probably better off there than anywhere else. According to the census there were in Washington, in 1890, 77 churches for colored people, valued at $1,182,650, with 22,965 communicants. There were 250 colored teachers in charge of 13,332 colored pupils; but there were also during the year 483 young mothers whom neither education nor religion had restrained from open violation of the moral law.

I shall quote further presently, but before I give statistics I wish to bring as a witness the voluntary statement of one of our ex-District Commissioners. I have here a hearing before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, consisting of Messrs. Grout, Bingham, McCleary, Allen, and Benton, in charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill for 1901. Major Sylvester and Mr. Wight, the then Commissioner, having charge of the police department of the city government, were asking for more policemen. Here is what took place:

Mr. BENTON. I would like to ask you if it is not a fact that there is not another city in this country of equal population to this as well patrolled as this. Is there another one?

Major SYLVESTER. Yes; there are better patrolled cities.

Mr. BENTON. There may be a good many more policemen; but is not the criminal class as successfully taken care of in Washington as in any other city of its size in the country?

Major SYLVESTER. I believe so; but when I answer that statement I want to invite your attention to what I stated to you as to the hours of labor these men have.

Mr. BENTON. I recollect what you said on that subject. You effect it, but you have to work your men more than you ought to.

Here is the Commissioner's statement:

Mr. WIGHT. Perhaps I had better answer that, because it might be a little embarrassing to Major Sylvester. I think it is remarkably to the credit of the police department, with the small amount of men and the large amount of criminal classes——

Mr. BENTON. I did not know that there was a very great amount. I know there is not a great deal of crime here, comparatively.

The CHAIRMAN. They are not the worst criminals.

Mr. WIGHT. I say it with all kindness, but I state it as a fact, that the 90,000 colored people here are equal to the criminal conditions in any city. They regard life as of no value whatever.

Here is a lifelong Republican, charged with the solemn duty of governing this city, and that is what he said. What corroborative evidence have I in regard to the conditions in Washington to sustain this terrible revelation, as it was to me? I will read first from Mr. Hoffman, because I can not be too long about this, and I am only citing gentlemen who wish to investigate, to this book which affords a fund of information about the colored race throughout the country, North and South, East and West. He gives here a table furnished from the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia for 1894, in which we have the illegitimacy in Washington for the years from 1879 to 1894. I wish to print it in my remarks, but I shall simply call attention to the facts that the average for the white race in 1894 was 2.92 per cent, while the average for the colored race was 22.49 per cent. That was the total of illegitimate births; and the saddest part of all of this is that in 1879 there were only 17.60 per cent of colored, while in 1893 there were 27 per cent and in 1894 26.46 per cent, and for the four preceding years there had been more than 25 per cent of births of illegitimate colored children in the city of Washington.

The explanation is made, or, rather, the bald fact is stated, that immorality of that kind, which lies at the very root of civilization and civilizing influences, is abroad; that it goes on in spite of religious teachings and educational opportunities. That is the appalling thing for us to consider.

The table referred to is as follows:

Illegitimacy in Washington, D. C., 1879–1894.

(Percentage of illegitimate in total number of births.)

	White.	Colored.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now I will quote something from Mr. Hoffman. He says:

I have given the statistics of the general progress of the race in religion and education for the country at large, and have shown that in church and school the number of attending members or pupils is constantly increasing; but in the statistics of crime and the data of illegitimacy the proof is furnished that neither religion nor education has influenced to an appreciable degree the moral progress of the race. Whatever benefit the individual colored man may have gained from the extension of religious worship and educational processes, the race as a whole has gone backward rather than forward.

Next he says:

It was a favorite argument of the opponents of slavery that freedom, education, and citizenship would elevate the negro to the level of the white in a generation or two. One writer, in a report to the Anti-Slavery Society, which was widely circulated, made use of the following language in regard to the effects of the emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies: "The abolition of slavery gave the death blow to open vice. Immediate emancipation, instead of opening the flood gates, was the only power strong enough to shut them down. Those great controllers of moral action, self-respect, attachment to law, and veneration of God, which slavery destroyed, freedom has resuscitated."

That is a quotation. Mr. Hoffman goes on and marshals some facts which utterly annihilate that contention. He says:

The West India slaves were completely emancipated in 1838. About thirty years later the American Missionary, in commenting upon the people of Jamaica, used the following language: "A man may be a drunkard, a liar, a Sabbath breaker, a profane man, a fornicator, an adulterer, and such like, and be known to be such, and go to chapel and hold up his head there, and feel no disgrace from those things, because they are so common as to create a public sentiment in his favor."

About twenty-five years later James Anthony Froude, the great English historian, wrote of the negro in the West Indies in the following severe terms:

Morals in the technical sense they have none, but they can not be said to sin, because they have no knowledge of the law and therefore can not commit a breach of the law. They are naked and not ashamed. They are married, as they call it, but not parsoned. The woman prefers a looser tie that she may be able to leave the man if he treat her unkindly. A missionary told me that a marriage connection rarely turned out well which begins with legal marriage. The system is strange, but it answers. There is evil, but there is not the demoralizing effect of evil. They sin, but they sin only as animals sin, without shame, because there is no sense of wrongdoing; they eat the forbidden fruit, but it brings with it no knowledge of the difference between good and evil—in fact, these poor children of darkness have escaped the consequences of the fall, and must come of another stock, after all.

Mr. Hoffman resumes:

The statements of the various writers on the social condition of the West India negro are supported by reliable statistical evidence. The table below, compiled from the annual reports of the registrar-general of Jamaica, bears mute testimony on this point:

Illegitimacy and illiteracy in Jamaica.

	Percentage of illegitimate births.	Percentage of females signing marriage register with mark.
1880–81	57.7	66.8
1881–82	58.2	67.7
1882–83	58.09	68.6
1883–84	58.9	68.8
1884–85	59.9	67.7
1885–86	59.6	64
1886–87	59.8	64.8
1887–88	60.6	64.8
1888–89	60.5	65.5
1889–90	61.7	64.9
1890–91	60.7	63.7
1891–92	60.6	61.6
1892–93	60.1	60
1893–94	60.6	59.4
1894–95	60.8	57.1

Indicating the increase in education. Mr. Hoffman sadly comments there. He says:

After fifty years of educational and religious influence under conditions of freedom, sixty out of every hundred births are acknowledged to be illegitimate.

Further on Mr. Hoffman says:

After nearly sixty years of freedom in the West Indies and after thirty years of freedom in this country, during which the most elaborate efforts have been made to improve the moral and social condition of the race, we find that its physical and moral tendency is downward.

One other quotation and I have done with this book for the present. Giving the percentage of criminals, he quotes from the official record of convicts in the Pennsylvania penitentiaries:

Convicts in the Pennsylvania penitentiaries, 1886 and 1894.

	Males.			Females.
	Total.	Colored.	Percentage of colored.	Total.	Colored.	Percentage of colored.
1886	1,730	244	14.10	41	14	34.15
1894	2,312	384	16.61	52	18	34.61

	Males.	Females.
Percentage of colored in total population over 15 years of age in 1890	2.23	2.09

The table shows that in Pennsylvania, in 1894, 16.61 per cent of the male inmates and 34.61 per cent of the females were colored; yet in the whole population of the State over 15 years of age only 2.23 per cent of the males and 2.09 per cent of the females were persons of African descent, showing an excessively high proportion of colored convicts.

It is rather strange that nearly all, or a large number, of the colored people who have gravitated North from our part of the world must be the bad negroes; and yet, coming in contact with this constantly increasing class of criminals, we find people up there who say that the stock from which they sprang is good enough to govern South Carolina. I will remark in passing that the conditions in our State are even worse. That is the astounding and the inexplicable situation to me. I have here a witness who speaks about Illinois. Benjamin C. Whitehead, of the New Orleans Times-Democrat, writing from Chicago, says:

A THREATENING CLOUD.

The more serious condition growing out of the negro problem is yet to come, criminologists and officers fear. The negro youth is the threatening cloud obscuring all hope of something better. As the first generation after slavery deteriorated in character and moral worth, the negro children of to-day tend toward vice and crime. In the John Worthy School at Chicago, an institution founded upon benevolent ideas and calculated to teach the mistaught boys the true path to upright citizenship, a most sickening scandal was brought to light from inquiry into the habits and practices of negro boys, and the investigation afforded a very good index to the inclination of even the very young negro children. The details of the scandal are too vile for publication, but the reader who is familiar with negro conduct may have some idea of the character of the testimony if not of the extent of the offenders' misconduct.

The negroes form 2 per cent of the population of Illinois.

Very nearly the same proportion that exists in Pennsylvania.

At the Illinois Home for Female Juvenile Offenders at Geneva 13 per cent of the inmates are negroes. At the boys' prison at Pontiac 18 per cent of those incarcerated are negroes. The negro lists in the juvenile prisons are constantly increasing. In the Chester penitentiary no statistics are furnished regarding the relative number of negroes and whites, but in the Joliet prison Warden Murphy affords the information that more than 16 per cent of the prisoners are negroes. In connection with this it may be stated that of the female prisoners there 27 are white and 38 are negroes.

It may appear in the eyes of some that I am bringing out all this for the sinister purpose of belittling the negro race—of dooming them to obloquy and mistreatment. I want to say to you—and I say it with all the sincerity of my nature—that I do not hate the negro. I was nursed by a black mammy. I have on my farm in South Carolina to-day a negro man of about my own age, Joe Gibson, who has been with me thirty years. He has charge of my keys and of everything I possess there in the way of a house, furniture, horses and carriages, and everything for a farm of 200 acres, worth some twelve or fifteen thousand dollars. I trust him implicitly. He can not read or write. He has got a wife who is as trustworthy as he is.

All negroes are not bad; a very small percentage of them are bad; but the bad ones are leading all the rest, and they are patted on the back by the politicians at the North. Every farmer throughout the South who is familiar with the locality in which he lives knows that there are on many of those plantations—in fact, on nearly all of them where any considerable number of negroes live—a large number of good, quiet, peaceable, orderly, and more or less industrious colored people, who are endeavoring to make a living with the least labor possible, and getting along pleasantly and peacefully with their white friends. But the younger generation is worthless—wholly unreliable—and in every community there are young vagabonds most of whom have a smattering of education who are doing all the devilment of which we read every day.

The condition which the President has precipitated by his revival of a worn-out policy, the discussion of the status of this man throughout the country and of his future, will not down. It is like Banquo's ghost, and the sooner we take hold of the question in a calm, statesmanlike way and endeavor to set in motion instrumentalities which will do something to stop the agitation and to help these people, if they can be helped, the better it will be for all concerned.

I am ready to lend any information I possess and to give the best thought I have, because I have given thought to this subject for the last thirty years, mainly from the point of view I have occupied up to now, that it was my duty to my own people and to my own State to stand forever opposed to any idea of political or social equality on the part of the negro with the whites of South Carolina. You have just had facts collected by a man whose statements with regard to himself would gain credit anywhere as to being an impartial observer and student of this great question. Opposed to that we have a vast amount of nebulous contention and assertion of claims; and I want to read here the latest that I have come across from the very highest negro authority, a man who stands highest in the estimation of white men North and South of any man of his race—Booker T. Washington.

In an address in New York on Washington's Birthday, Booker T. Washington, at a memorial meeting held in the Academy of Arts and Sciences, devoted his remarks to the consideration of the race problem. He said in part:

Unlike the Indian, the original Mexican, or the Hawaiian, the negro, so far from dying out when in contact with a stronger and different race, has continued to increase in numbers to such an extent that whereas the race entered bondage 20 in number, there are now more than 9,000,000. So I want to emphasize the truth that whether we are of Northern or of Southern birth, whether we are black or white, we must face frankly the hard, stubborn fact that in bondage and in freedom the negro, in spite of all predictions to the contrary, has continued year by year to increase in numbers until he now forms about one-seventh of the entire population, and that there are no signs that the same ratio of increase will not hold good in the future. Further than this, despite of all the changing, uncertain conditions through which the race has passed and is passing in this country, whether in bondage or in freedom, he has made a steady gain in acquiring property, skill, habits of industry, education, and Christian character.

To deal directly with the affairs of my own race, I believe that both the teachings of history, as well as the results of everyday observation, should convince us that we shall make our most enduring progress by laying the foundations carefully, patiently, in the ownership of the soil, the exercise of habits of economy, the saving of money, the securing of the most complete education of hand and head, and the cultivation of Christian virtues.

I can not believe, I will not believe, that the country which invites into its midst every type of European, from the highest to the very dregs of the earth, and gives these comers shelter, protection, and the highest encouragement, will refuse to accord the same protection and encouragement to her black citizens. The negro seeks no special privileges. All that he asks is opportunity—that the same law which is made by the white man and applied to the one race be applied with equal certainty and exactness to the other.

Here we have the apostle of technical and industrial education, a man who has warned his people against the folly of political office, showing in spite of his wisdom that he has the same dream.

I quote again:

All that he asks is opportunity—that the same law which is made by the white man and applied to the one race be applied with equal certainty and exactness to the other.

I do not wish to comment on his utterances except to show that his hopes and aspirations are natural and even pathetic. But while he gives advice to his people that is wise, afar off he sees a vision of equality, and I say that his dream can never come to pass. His claims about the negro race are largely guesswork and can not stand against the facts as set out by Hoffman.

Mr. President, I do not want to tire the Senate, but I have here the work of a student of ethnology, of sociology, and of philosophy, one of the greatest minds of the last century, Max Muller, the famous Sanskrit scholar, who has delved deeper into the mine of Indian lore and East Indian traditions and religion than any other man, living or dead. In his Essay on Caste, he deals directly with the question which confronts us, and it is my desire, if you will be patient with me, to give you some quotations from this scholar, this man whose sole purpose and desire was to give to his countrymen the truth and the facts as his long years of laborious research had enabled him to arrive at them. And it is in regard to the question of caste—that inherent, irrepressible, indelible feeling which exists in the mind of every human being under certain conditions and circumstances, for which we are not responsible because it grows with our growth in childhood and becomes part and parcel of every fiber of flesh and bone of which our bodies are composed. In explanation of the conditions which he found in India, Muller says:

As soon as we trace the complicated system of caste, such as we find it in India at the present day, back to its first beginnings, we find that it flows from at least three different sources, and that accordingly we must distinguish between ethnological, political, and professional caste.

Ethnological caste arises wherever different races are brought in contact. There is and always has been a mutual antipathy between the white and the black man, and when the two are brought together, either by conquest or migration, the white man has invariably asserted his superiority, and established certain social barriers between himself and his dark-skinned brother. The Aryas and the Sudras seem to have felt this mutual antipathy. The difference of blood and color was heightened in ancient times by difference of religion and language; but in modern times also, and in countries where the negro has learned to speak the same language and to worship the same God as his master, the white man can never completely overcome the old feeling that seems to lurk in his very blood and makes him recoil from the embrace of his darker neighbor. And even where there is no distinction of color, an analogous feeling, the feeling of race, asserts its influence, as if inherent in human nature. Between the Jew and the Gentile, the Greek and the barbarian, the Saxon and the Celt, the Englishman and the foreigner, there is something—whether we call it hatred, or antipathy, or mistrust, or mere coldness—which in a primitive state of society would necessarily lead to a system of castes, and which, even in more civilized countries, will never be completely eradicated.

In tracing the condition in India as far back as he could get any authentic information, Muller tells us that caste existed there from the first settlement of that peninsula, and he goes on to describe the various strata of society and of population in the two hundred and odd millions of the inhabitants of Hindostan, and he winds up by saying that the word "caste" itself, in its primary significance, simply means color. He gives some very funny and ridiculous descriptions as to what the law of caste has forced those people to do and to believe and to feel. Here, for instance, is one:

Low as the Sudra stood in the system of Manu, he stood higher than most of the mixed castes, the Varnasankaras. The son of a Sudra by a Sudra woman is purer than the son of a Sudra by a woman of the highest caste (Manu X, 30). Manu calls the Kandala one of the lowest outcasts, because he is the son of a Sudra father and a Brahmanic mother. He evidently considered the mésalliance of a woman more degrading than that of a man.

Just as we do.

For the son of a Brahman father and a Sudra mother may in the seventh generation raise his family to the highest caste (Manu X, 64)—

In South Carolina we recognize octoroons as white people—

while the son of a Sudra father and a Brahman mother belongs forever to the Kandalas. The abode of the Kandalas must be out of the town, and no respectable man is to hold intercourse with them. By day they must walk about distinguished by badges; by night they are driven out of the city.

He goes on to philosophize on this subject of race antagonism and association and contact, and of the laws of society even in England, and I will give a quotation without reading it all. He gives a remarkable illustration of the sense of indignation of one of the old-time English aristocracy, saying:

Even in England the public service has but very lately been thrown open to all classes, and we heard it stated by one of the most eminent men that the Indian civil service would no longer be fit for the sons of gentlemen. Why? Because one of the elected candidates was the son of a missionary.

As illustrative of the intense cruelty, I may say, which this law in India has brought about, you all recollect the immolation of the child widows who had been married in their infancy, and if the husband to whom they had been married died, they were forbidden to marry anyone else. You all recall the Juggernaut car, with the idolators, so to speak, rushing in front and throwing themselves down to be crushed. You all remember the ceremony of burning, after maturity, a woman whose husband had died after marriage, and all that kind of thing. Muller states here:

In former times a Pariah was obliged to carry a bell—the very name of Pariah is derived from that bell—in order to give warning to the Brahmans, who might be polluted by the shadow of an outcast. In Malabar a Nayadi defiles a Brahman at a distance of 74 paces—and a Nayer, though himself a Sudra, would shoot one of these degraded races if he approached too near.

If he gets within 74 paces the Brahman is polluted.

Here is what I want you gentlemen to consider:

Those who know the Hindus best are the least anxious to see them without caste. Colonel Sleeman remarks:

"What chiefly prevents the spread of Christianity is the dread of exclusion from caste and all its privileges, and the utter hopelessness of their ever finding any respectable circle of society of the adopted religion, which converts, or would-be converts, to Christianity now everywhere feel."

He says further:

Caste can not be abolished in India, and to attempt it would be one of the most hazardous operations that was ever performed on a living political body. As a religious institution, caste will die; as a social institution, it will live and improve. Let the Sudras, or, as they are called in Tamil, the Petta Pittei, the children of the house, grow into free laborers, the Vaisyas into wealthy merchants, the Kshatriyas into powerful barons, and let the Brahmans aspire to the position of that intellectual aristocracy which is the only true aristocracy in truly civilized countries, and the four castes of the Veda will not be out of date in the nineteenth century, nor out of place in a Christian country. But all this must be the work of time. "The teeth," as a native writer says, "fall off themselves in old age, but it is painful to extract them in youth."

Is this the genesis of the Booker Washington idea?

Muller, after devoting a lifetime to the study of the language, literature, and conditions in India, sums up with this declaration. It is worth all the schools and colleges, sermons and preachments, religious or political, that have ever been uttered on the subject of African regeneration. The mothers must lift the race or its doom is sealed.

AS SOON AS THE FEMALE POPULATION OF INDIA CAN BE RAISED FROM THEIR PRESENT DEGRADATION; AS SOON AS A BETTER EDUCATION AND A PURER RELIGION WILL HAVE INSPIRED THE WOMEN OF INDIA WITH FEELINGS OF MORAL RESPONSIBILITY AND SELF-RESPECT; AS SOON AS THEY HAVE LEARNED—WHAT CHRISTIANITY ALONE CAN TEACH—THAT IN THE TRUE LOVE OF A WOMAN THERE IS SOMETHING FAR ABOVE THE LAW OF CASTE OR THE CURSES OF PRIESTS, THEIR INFLUENCE WILL BE THE MOST POWERFUL, ON THE ONE SIDE, TO BREAK THROUGH THE ARTIFICIAL FORMS OF CASTE, AND, ON THE OTHER, TO MAINTAIN IN INDIA, AS ELSEWHERE, THE TRUE CASTE OF RANK, MANNERS, INTELLECT, AND CHARACTER.

Senators will recollect that the Sepoy rebellion of 1857, with all its horrors, was produced by reason of the fact that the English officers forced the Sepoys simply to bite cartridges with hog grease on them. You will say, "That is all no good here; we are civilized Americans; we are the highest type of men." Bonaparte said, "If you scratch a Russian, you will find a Tartar." If you scratch the white man too deep, you will find the same savage whose ancestry used to roam wild in Britain when the Danes and Saxons first crossed over. I have seen doctors of divinity, I have seen the very highest and best men we have, lose all semblance of Christian human beings in their anger and frenzy when some female of their acquaintance or one of their daughters had been ravished, and they were as wild and cruel as any tiger of the jungle. You can not make us over by law. Constitutions do not change human nature.

I come now, after this imperfect portrayal, to another feature. There is much material here, and it covers much ground, in reference to racial antagonism. Look at the history of the Danube Valley, with its teeming millions of Slavs and Magyars and Bosnians and Servians and Dalmatians, and the Turks and the Macedonians, who have been cutting each other's throats for six centuries, all white people at that, but simply with a racial antagonism.

Look at India, with its two hundred and odd millions, nobody knows how many, governed by 400,000 Englishmen. Where in history can you point to an instance in which white men proper, the best type of white men, or even the lowest type, have been dominated very long by any colored people? It is not in our blood. When you force conditions, when you gentlemen relentlessly and remorselessly stand by your mistakes of the period from 1868 to 1872, when the fifteenth amendment was placed on our backs, and say, "It stands there sacred, and it must stay," you force us to face an alternative which in the future is bound to produce a conflict of races. That dire condition is ahead of us, and, like the sword of Damocles, it hangs by a very slender thread.

We ask you to pause and think. We beg you not to drive us to desperation. You say we must keep the door of hope open to the negro. Please consider the shutting of that door to the white man. If you could force that policy upon my State and we submitted to it quietly and peaceably, in the next fifty years at the outside we would have a majority of negroes in South Carolina who could outvote the whites. Give them a peaceful election, no resistance, absolute equality before the law, and what happens? The negroes capture the government. They do not own any of the property, or only a very small percentage. They have none of the intelligence, or so little that it does not count. They have none of the character, or so little that it does not count. They have none of the knowledge of government which is bred in our bones. But let us submit; let the negroes take possession; let them have a negro government; let them control taxation; and if we have sunk so low by that time as to forget all traditions of Anglo-Saxons, of Caucasians, then what follows?

The governing race in any community, where there is absolute equality before the law, and equality for which the President contends before the law, and equality of opportunity, will in time come to amalgamation with any different race that may be there. The reason why we have not had any amalgamation in any of the racial antagonisms of which I have spoken, except in a limited degree, the reason why the Slavs and the Magyars in Hungary have never intermarried to any considerable degree, is because they hate each other, and whichever one crosses the line loses caste with his fellows and is absorbed into the other race.

What is the fundamental hope, what is the dream of the negro agitators, these men who are importuning the President now and are making his life a burden to him in regard to appointments to office of men of their race? I will produce a witness. He may not be a good one, but that is not my fault. In the Washington Post of January 27 I find this statement:

HAYES STIRS HIS RACE—VIRGINIA NEGRO LEADER TALKS OF SWORD AND TORCH—WASHINGTON CROWD APPLAUD—JAMES H. HAYES PREDICTS FORCIBLE RESISTANCE TO THE VIRGINIA CONSTITUTION AND OTHER ACTS OF DISFRANCHISEMENT PASSED BY SOUTHERN LEGISLATURES—TEMPER OF A MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN CHURCH.

You all read it, at least most of you did. I will incorporate it in my speech, with the consent of the Senate.

At a mass meeting of colored people at Lincoln Memorial Church, at 8 o'clock last night, under the auspices of the Afro-American Council, prominent speakers of the negro race made addresses upon the question of disfranchisement in the Southern States, and considerable feeling was manifested.

James H. Hayes, of Richmond, the attorney who has been retained by the colored people of Virginia to test the disfranchisement laws of that State, delivered a speech in which he declared that the negro has now reached the limit of his endurance, and advocated the sword and torch as a means for the negro to maintain his manhood. His remarks were received with great enthusiasm.

He referred to the fact that during the years which have elapsed since the war sectional feeling between the North and South has died out to such an extent that Virginia now proposes to place a monument of Lee in Statuary Hall in the National Capitol, but said that all this period has not been sufficient for the negro to advance one inch beyond the place he held when liberated from slavery.

"There is nothing in Virginia for the negro," he said, "but degradation, unless the negroes make a firm stand, contend for their rights, and, if necessary, die for them. I am not an anarchist," he added, "and I don't mean to go out and kill anybody, but to let somebody else kill you." This veiled sally provoked loud applause and laughter. "In Virginia," added the speaker, "you are 'Jim Crows.' You opened the meeting to-night by singing 'My country, 'tis of thee,' but I wonder how negroes can sing that song. For myself, I am a man without a country.

"The time has come when the negro must fight, not theoretically, not intellectually; but fight with his hands. The disfranchisement of the children of Israel in Egypt has been followed letter for letter by the disfranchisement in the South."

He then spoke about Moses being called to lead the Israelites from their bondage and drew attention to the fact that slavery for four hundred years had made them cowards, so that they were obliged to turn back, drawing a parallel to the case of the negro in America.

"A second time," he continued, "the children of God arose. This time they had the leadership of Joshua, and when they went forth from the land of their bondage they did not go meekly, but carried the sword in one hand and the torch in the other. In this country," also he added, "a second generation has grown up in the forty years since the war. The Atlanta Constitution has threatened us with the Kuklux if the growth of Federal appointments in the South continues. I make the prediction that when the Southern people start to Kukluxing this time they will not have as the objects of their oppression the same timid people they Kukluxed in the sixties.

"Negroes are leaving the State of Virginia because of the treatment they are receiving. What we want to do is to start something, and keep it up until the white people stop something. We don't intend to be oppressed any longer. We don't intend to be crushed. I am afraid we are anarchistic, that we are anarchists, and I give the warning that if this oppression in the South continues the negro must resort to the sword and torch, and that the Southland will become a land of blood and desolation.

"I want to make the assertion right here that we are not going to be disfranchised in Virginia. It is written in the heavens and engraved upon the stars that the Virginia negro does not intend to submit to disfranchisement. We are told, 'Let the negro obtain education and wealth if he would gain the political equality which he desires.' I say that never was a bigger lie uttered. The more the negro advances the more will political rights be denied him. It is not the common negro in the South who is cut off the registration lists. It is not the ditch digger. It is the educated negro, the doctor and lawyer and preacher, who are deprived unlawfully of political rights and manhood by the iniquitous constitution of Virginia, which cost half a million dollars to frame. And I want to say that by the time we get through punching holes in the constitution it will cost the State of Virginia half a million more."

The sting of that speech is in the tail, and I want to read you what this colored orator, who made the members of his race in that tabernacle or church go wild with enthusiasm, as the report states, said:

"It is claimed that the negro industrial schools are the proper lines of effort for the race. Talk about education and wealth, and say that they make votes for the negro. It's a lie. No, they are destroying votes. Every negro who puts on a clean collar and tries to be a man is destroying a vote. I believe God will take care of us. And just one word about the question of the absorption of the races."

The speaker added significantly:

"No two people having the same religion and speaking the same tongue, living together, have ever been kept apart. This is well known, and it is one of the reasons why the dominant race is crushing out the strength of the negro in the South."

There is your open door and it is easy to see to what doom it leads. The purpose and hope of those who indorse this policy and are madly pressing it on us in the South is that we in time shall become a country or State of mulattoes. Wendell Phillips in his Fourth of July speech in 1863 openly advocated amalgamation. Theodore Tilton also advocated it. Thad. Stevens practiced it. It was not surprising. It was not to be wondered at that those men who had devoted their lives to the propaganda of abolition should have allowed their sentimentality to get the better of all judgment and race pride. Hayes is of a type of negroes who are growing in number daily. He is only more bold and less cunning and cautious than the rest. He repudiates Booker Washington and his teachings, but his race in Washington "go wild" over his ravings.

Look southward, if you please, over the Rio Grande, and tell me what you see from there to Cape Horn. You see no society that is pure blooded; you see no commonwealth that is self-governing. You see a mongrelized aggregation of Indians and Spaniards and negroes inhabiting that land who make orderly government a byword and a hissing. No such doom as that is possible to the Southern States. No such scheme will ever receive the indorsement of the American people, and if it does then God have mercy on this country, for there will be a hundred times more blood shed than ever was shed before "the stars in their courses fought against Diura." I do not threaten you. I prayerfully warn you. I know those people. I know your stock as well as mine. You would not submit to it. We can not. We dare not. We will not!

I want to touch a moment on the effect of education on men. Under existing conditions we are left absolutely without any barrier in dealing with suffrage other than the ability to read and write. In my State we have enlarged that by permitting those who pay taxes on $300 worth of property, whether or not they read or write, to use the ballot. But who here is prepared to say that the mere acquirement of enough education to read and write makes a good citizen—that it fits a man for the complicated duties of self-government and participation in self-government? Pope declared that—

"A LITTLE LEARNING IS A DANGEROUS THING."

And it is the quintessence of folly to suppose that the African can emulate, or successfully imitate even, the Anglo Saxon in matters of government. The history of the race in the continent where it originated and still exists by the hundreds of millions is that of barbarism, savagery, cannibalism, and everything which is low and degrading.

This has been the story of all the centuries. It is idle to expect such beings to be transformed in a generation or two into good citizens capable of governing themselves.

My observation teaches me that where there is no moral training there is no character. If along with the training of the head—the mere ability to translate letters into words—there be not a training of the moral faculties, the realization of the difference between right and wrong, the instinct to tell the truth, to be virtuous and honest, what good do your three little r's do?

I did not want to say anything about what are the conditions in the South as I know them to be by personal contact and observation all my life. I have preferred to marshal the evidence of an unbiased witness, who has taken the official reports and the scientific data, and to tell you what he has to say about this race. But I am willing to say that the little smattering of education which negroes are receiving now has absolutely no influence upon their upbuilding as a people. It does not increase by one-quarter of an inch their stature in manhood. It is not elevating, but enervating and destructive of the original virtues of the negro race, and they have their virtues as well as we have.

I want to direct your attention to a remarkable fact in the history of this country, which can not be too much dwelt upon. When the Southern white men, from 16 to 60 years of age, all of them living in the cotton States, except a few in the mountains, had left their homes during the civil war to follow the standards of Lee and Jackson, of Johnston and Forrest, and when there were absolutely no men there except the old men above 60 and 65 and the little schoolboys—and the country then was much less thickly populated than it is now and altogether more agricultural—with over 4,000,000 negroes there were at least 1,000,000 males of adult age, slaves scattered throughout the breadth of the land, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, and the wives and daughters of their masters were left to their care and protection.

The negroes knew the war was to settle the question of their future liberty or continued slavery. If there existed in their hearts any cause for hatred and resentment and a desire for revenge, such as you gentlemen in your youth were led to believe existed from reading Harriet Beecher Stowe's novel, and other sources of information and when oratory poured out its plea for the poor, downtrodden African—if these people had then been imbued with one-tenth of the hatred of the whites which exists to-day, if they had cause for hate, what would have been the consequences upon the helpless white women and children then living among them? The very imagination sickens at the picture of rapine and murder and of the cruelties and horrors of which we have read in Hayti and San Domingo, and which would have been repeated in the South. Yet they were slaves and had, as you believe, ample cause for revenge and hate.

But what are the facts, Senators? During those four dark years there is not of record a solitary case where a negro man wronged a white woman. What is the situation now? Take your morning paper and read it any day in the year, and there is hardly a day in which our sensibilities are not wrought up and our passions aroused or our pity aroused by some tale of horror and of woe.

I tell you from my own experience and observation that the old sense of security and of love and friendship on the part of the negro for his white master and his mistress and the children, which I myself experienced in my boyhood, has gone. With the remnant of the old negroes who were born in slavery and had some of that training (all of whom are now necessarily above 40) gone, the last restraining and conservative element among them will have disappeared. They have been taught that they are the equals of the whites. During the reconstruction period, when they had the ballot and professed to govern, and levied taxes and marched themselves in the statehouses, constantly squandering and stealing of our substances, they learned their lesson well. They tasted blood. They were innoculated with the virus of equality. A great poet tells us that those who love liberty must first deserve it.

Among the dusky millions who were held in bondage there were, of course, many who had been cruelly wronged and suffered injustice, but the overwhelming majority of them had no feeling for their masters and their families except love and veneration. They looked up to them as superior beings. They felt the obligations of the trusts which had been reposed in them, and many of them were true unto death. The fact which can not be disputed is one to give us pause when we undertake to analyze the present conditions.

So the poor African has become a fiend, a wild beast, seeking whom he may devour, filling our penitentiaries and our jails, lurking around to see if some helpless white woman can be murdered or brutalized. Yet he can read and write. He has a little of the veneer of education and civilization, according to New England ideas.

I do not blame the New England people. They have none, or few, of the negroes. The whole number beyond New York would not equal the negroes in my county. The people up there can afford to theorize and to determine upon the life and death of the civilization of the South from their standpoint of sentimentality, if they are willing, but I do not believe they are now willing. I do not believe they want to. I give them credit for more love of humanity and of their kind than to bring on a conflict of that sort. If there were no higher motives, I give them credit for more statesmanship. But, with the constantly increasing hatred between the races, with the older white men, acquainted with the better negroes, dying off, as they are doing rapidly; with the old negroes, the grandfathers of the race, dying off rapidly, as they are doing, in a very short while those who know anything of the relation of the slave and the master in the old days will have disappeared and gone.

And then the younger generation of white men, who are hating these negroes in return, whose animosity and antagonism grow apace with these acute situations and conditions, have got to face this problem. I thank God sometimes that I will not live to see the thing brought to a focus. I am endeavoring in my feeble way to beg you, for God's sake, not to help produce that acute stage of fever and race hatred and carry it through until you bring into people those angry passions which will put the races at each other's throats with the resolve on the part of the whites to die or maintain their supremacy. Everyone knows what will be the result.

What effect does it have to appoint a negro to office in a community, many of which I could mention in my State, where there are three or five negroes to one white, just as there are in Indianola three negroes to a white person in that entire community, and in the adjoining county of Washington there are absolutely ten to one, just as in Beaufort, S. C., there are ten to one? What effect does it have for the knowledge to go out all over and among them, at their churches and everywhere else, that the great President of the United States is still their friend; that he does not intend to allow the "door of hope to be shut upon them;" that he wants to offer them an opportunity in life; that he is going to recognize them and give them offices to represent the United States Government? Does that tend to peace, tend to good order, tend to produce that feeling of subordination which is their only salvation?

Some people have been ready to believe and to contend that the negro is a white man with a black skin. All history disproves that. Go to Africa. What do you find there? From one hundred and fifty million to two hundred million savages.

I happened in my boyhood, when I was about 12 years old, to see some real Africans fresh from their native jungles. The last cargo of slaves imported into this country were brought here in 1858 on the yacht Wanderer, landed on an island below Savannah, and sneaked by the United States marshal up the Savannah River and landed a little distance below Augusta, and my family bought some thirty of them.

Therefore I had a chance to see just what kind of people these were, and to compare the African as he is to-day in Africa with the African who, after two centuries of slavery, was brought side by side to be judged. The difference was as "Hyperion to a satyr." Those poor wretches, half starved as they had been on their voyage across the Atlantic, shut down and battened under the hatches and fed a little rice, several hundred of them, were the most miserable lot of human beings—the nearest to the missing link with the monkey—I have ever put my eyes on.

Now, I do not go into the philosophy of it, or undertake to act as God's interpreter, because I have no ambition of that sort and I would not presume to even suggest a thing more than to say that if we consider the destinies of this race from a broad standpoint, and compare the condition of the African in Africa to-day, the highest and best of them, with the condition of the American negroes, such as we now have them, or such as we had them in 1865, I do not hesitate to say that among the four million and odd slaves who were in the South in 1865 there were more good, Christian men and women and gentlemen and ladies than all Africa could show then or can show now.

Then if God in His providence ordained slavery and had these people transported over here for the purpose of civilizing enough of them to form a nucleus and to become missionaries back to their native heath, that is a question. I have a letter here from a distinguished African bishop who believes it, and I want to read it. But the thing I want to call your attention to is that slavery was not an unmitigated evil for the negro, because whatever of progress the colored race has shown itself capable of achieving has come from slavery; and whether among those four million there were not more good men and women than could be found among the nine million now is to my mind a question. I would not like to assert it; but I am strongly of that belief from the facts I know in regard to the demoralization that has come to those people down there by having liberty thrust upon them in the way it was, and then having the ballot and the burdens of government, and being subjected to the strain of being tempted and misled and duped and used as tools by designing white men who went there among them.

A little while back I received a letter from this man—I never met him—making some comment on something he had seen about my utterances in regard to the negro in some speech or lecture. My newspaper friends have always taken it upon themselves to quote everything that is lurid and hot and vitriolic that I say, and then to finish by saying, "The Senator from South Carolina made a characteristic speech," leaving anything that was sane and rational and decent and eloquent, if I ever rise to eloquence, out of the whole account. That is unintentional, doubtless. In their pursuit for sensation they have done me the great wrong to misrepresent me throughout this country. I do not fret over it. I know that the truth never has overtaken a lie, and I do not intend to undertake it; and I never will even make a start to run down the thousand and one lies that have been told on me.

But this man, this bishop, wrote me a letter and called my attention to a dream of his, an aspiration and a hope, and to suggest that I should submit his proposition to the Senate of the United States and lend it support. I wrote back to him the difficulty that lay in the way, the obstruction, the well-nigh impossibility of anything being done along that line to the extent he had dreamed of, and I went on to say something about my idea in regard to the negro, giving a little advice, as we are all so prone and ready to do. Advice is one of those commodities that nobody ever charges anything for except a lawyer. I got this letter in return:

ATLANTA, GA., January 24, 1903.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senator.

SIR: Yours of the 19th instant was upon my table when I reached home from Memphis, Tenn.

You say, if I know anything, I ought to know that the negro in the South must ever and forever remain subordinate or be destroyed and annihilated. I know that as well as you do, and even better, for a white man can not see the virus of this entire nation, from the Supreme Court of the United States down to the ward politician, as the colored man can see it and feel it. But this determination to degrade the negro and prevent his recognition as a man that God made is not only confined to the ruling masses of the South, but to the North as well. Color prejudice—

He seemed to agree with me in the idea I expressed in the beginning of my speech, that caste feeling, prejudice, whatever you call it, is just as strong in the North as it is with us, except that the provocation to exhibit it does not exist there. But let me go on with him—but to the North as well. Color prejudice is not a Southern institution alone, but of the United States. Hence my desire for my race to leave the nation and return to Africa. When I was a boy, 60 years ago, I thought then as I do now, that God allowed the negro to be brought to this country and civilized to redeem his kindred in Africa. And since I have traveled from one end of Africa to the other, I am stronger in my conviction than ever. And I did hope that, as Jefferson Davis was the negative force in the freedom of the negro, God had raised you up to be the negative force that should establish through governmental aid a highway for millions of our race to return to the land of our ancestors. I have been looking upon you as a creature of Providence—

Now, is not that a high compliment? [Laughter.] As you know—

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform—

and still think that your utterances in many instances will serve a purpose not even contemplated by yourself. Others of my race may denounce you, as they do in mass meetings and on the lecture platforms of this country, but I shall praise you and wish you godspeed; for I believe that you are serving a purpose of Providence that but few are aware of, and even yourself do not realize.

I judge you think, from the tone of your letter, that I am a politician—

I told him that if we could get the politicians to emigrate, God knows I would subsidize all the vessels Uncle Sam has and ship them to Africa or to heaven. He says:

I judge you think, from the tone of your letter, that I am a politician. But be politics far from me. I am no politician. Nor am I any office seeker for my race. I do not care if a negro never gets office in this country while the world stands. A little insignificant office in the face of all the laws that are enacted to prevent our rising to manhood is too small to merit my attention. The negro is a fool for wanting office. He is a fool for enlisting in the Army or Navy or in doing anything to protect a flag that gives white men all the stars and leaves nothing but the stripes for the negro. Please do not class me among the politicians.

You see this man has got some gray matter in his kinky head.

You say the natural increase of the negro by birth would be a bar to emigration solving the race problem. If I could talk with you I would make you see otherwise. For I know all about it—am acquainted with the statistics of immigration to this country. But I shall not intrude upon your time and patience. No reply to this letter will be expected.

Truly,
H. M. TURNER.

H. M. Turner is a bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. His scheme is before you to consider.

Now, Mr. President, a little brief summary, and I am done.

I have endeavored in my feeble and humble way to give you such historical light, such ethnological light, on this subject as I could come across in the brief time I have had, along with my other duties, to collect. I have relied mainly on the inner light of my own observations and my own feeling and knowledge of conditions.

I do not want to see the African driven to the wall. I do not want to shut the door of hope in his face. I am willing to give him every opportunity in life, all that the Declaration of Independence guarantees—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. But that does not involve, and so help me God I can not consent to have it involve, the dominance of that people over my people.

Then what are we to do? We have, as I have told you, a large negro majority in South Carolina. Negroes constituted the wealth of that State before the war when these slaves were chattels. They are there, and they do not want to leave, and we do not want them to leave. What I mean by that is that to-day the superficial thought is that if they left our fields would go untilled, our lands would become worthless, there would be a vacuum in the productions of that State, and if you took them out of the South you would create a cataclysm in finance, and would knock down and destroy not only the financial prosperity of this nation, but of all Europe.

So you can not approach this problem at a double-quick. It has been coming on us for two centuries or more. We will have to take the time to study out the best way to go about settling it, and then begin. We had better never begin than to begin wrong. We have already begun wrong. The blunders which have been made since 1865 have produced the present unfortunate and, I might say, dangerous situation.

Consider for a moment what it means to undertake to deport these people, to encourage them to emigrate. You are face to face with a problem which in its magnitude in expense will approximate the national debt at the close of the war. The getting together even in small quantity of 200,000 a year, or whatever number might equal the birth rate, and giving them the aid and the assistance to go across the ocean, or to go to South America, or to Mexico, or to the Philippines, or to Cuba, or to Africa, or anywhere else, involves transportation by sea, the food necessary to sustain them while they are on the way and in the time they are on shipboard the food to support life; and then when you land them on the other shore you are compelled by humanity to furnish them with the means of support until they can make a start in the world, until they can plant a crop and gather it.

So I think upon a rough estimate you can not possibly hope or expect to accomplish it under $300 per capita at a very low estimate.

How many of them want to go? I do not know, and certainly there is no law to make them go and Congress can not pass one. Joe does not want to go—my Joe. I do not know whether I belong to Joe or Joe belongs to me. Anyhow, we have been together for thirty years, and we have agreed to live together until one or both of us die, and when I go away, if I go first, I know he will shed as sincere tears as anybody. I would die to protect him from injustice or wrong.

Now, what are you going to do about it? Throughout that broad land there are hundreds and thousands of Joes. They do not care anything about voting. They do not know anything about it. Left alone and in peace as they are now, they do not know anything about the elections. They have forgotten all they did know about them. They have not voted in South Carolina since 1881, long before they were disfranchised according to the constitution and the law of the State. When we took the government away from them in 1876 we made it so clear that we intended to keep it that, after one or two spasmodic efforts, they surrendered all desire or contention, and virtually were satisfied to go and pick cotton on the 6th or 7th of November, when the first Tuesday came.

It is only these pestiferous creatures who are organized, as I said, into little Republican machines to furnish delegates to nominate a Republican President who are bothering about it; and it is those fellows who are in these offices who stir up bad blood and create race antagonism and create a feeling of opposition in the minds of all those who are willing to be misled.

Then comes this other idea—I had forgotten it. I wish the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] was in his seat. I have here a bill which I should like to have him explain. I had almost let it slip my mind. It is Senate bill 7254, introduced by Mr. HANNA, "to provide pensions for freedmen," and so forth. "Be it enacted," and so on. The bill carries with it—how much I do not know—forty, or fifty, or sixty million dollars. Oh, Mr. President, did Mr. HANNA mean that, or is it a political dodge? He can not answer, for he is not here. If he chooses to answer tomorrow, I shall be glad to hear him.

What has been the effect of this? There are passing up and down the South, from one end of it to the other, agents, shrewd, sharp fellows, mostly mulattoes, who have all the meanness of the white man, along with some intellectual superiority—many of them; some of them are good people. But these scoundrels are collecting at the negro churches and schools 10 cents, 20 cents, 30 cents, in accordance with the ability of the poor dupes to contribute to this fund, to hire lawyers to press this bill through Congress.

My God, was there ever a more infamous scheme to bamboozle and deceive since the Freedman's Bureau had those people contribute of their substance fifty-odd million dollars and then you allowed a lot of fellows to steal the best part of it?

Is there anybody on the other side willing to help me put this pension bill in one of the appropriation bills as a rider? I intend to move it—God knows I will—and let you vote on it, if I can get a chance. I want you to put yourselves on record whether you love these old negroes as well as I do. I am perfectly willing to give Joe and Kitty, both of whom were old slaves and who are ex-slaves, an appropriation of three or four hundred dollars or $10 a month apiece, and I will give them each a piece of land and let them stay on it, and when I want my shoes blacked and my carriage horses hitched up, or anything done for which I pay Joe, I will get it just the same without regard to the pension that Mr. HANNA is proposing to give.

Well, Mr. President, I am done. I have treated this subject but imperfectly, but I have spoken from the soul, from my very heart, to tell you the truth, so help me God. I warn you that in proportion as you arouse false hopes in these people's minds as to their future, keeping the door of hope open by giving them offices, you are only sowing the wind which will flame up into a whirlwind later on. You can not keep that door open without shutting it on the whites. The Northern millions which have gone down there have gone into negro colleges and schools to equip these people to compete with their white neighbors.

All of the millions that are being sent there by Northern philanthropy has been but to create an antagonism between the poorer classes of our citizens and these people upon whose level they are in the labor market. There has been no contribution to elevate the white people of the South, to aid and assist the Anglo-Saxon Americans, the men who are descended from the people who fought with Marion and Sumter. They are allowed to struggle in poverty and in ignorance, and to do everything they can to get along, and they see Northern people pouring in thousands and thousands to help build up an African domination.

Senators I leave the subject with you. May God give you wisdom and light to "do as you would have others do unto you."

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I had expected to submit some observations, following the Senator from South Carolina, but I dislike to go on at this late hour in the evening. I desire to take the floor now simply to submit my remarks to-morrow, if it is agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Will it not be agreeable to the Senator to continue until about 6 o'clock?

Mr. CARMACK. Very well; I will go on now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, if the question which has to-day been under discussion concerned only the people of Mississippi, I should not have one word to say in this debate. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] has shown himself amply able to defend the honor of his constituents against the aspersions that have been cast upon them. But it does not concern the people of Mississippi alone. What has been done to the people of Indianola might have been done and may be done to any other Southern community where the people dare to say above their breath that they would rather have a white person for their postmaster than a negro. That is absolutely all that the people of Indianola have done. You may take all the proof that has been paraded before the Senate and you will not find therein one scrap of evidence to show that a single act of violence was committed, that a single harsh or intemperate expression was uttered, or that any threat of violence was intended to be conveyed.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] seizes upon certain inconsequential expressions like "unpleasantness" and "strained relations," and he finds therein a threat of violence as easily as Sergeant Buzfuz found a proposal of marriage in the words "chops and tomato sauce." [Laughter.]

The statement went forth from the White House that the report of the inspector showed that threats of violence had been made. I have read that report of the inspector. I find nothing in it except a farrago of tomfoolery—of alleged suspicious circumstances; but even this inspector does not pretend that he had ever heard of one single threat as having been made by a single individual in the town of Indianola.

But as I have said, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to defend the people of Indianola. The Senator from Mississippi has done that with a clearness, a force, and an ability which leaves nothing to be desired.

I shall assume for the purpose of this argument that the statement which went forth from the White House is exactly true; that is, that a few, and only a few, of the people in the town of Indianola made threats of violence against the postmaster, and that she was driven in terror of her life, because of those threats, to abandon the post-office. Assuming, for the sake of argument, all that to be true, I say the action of the President in this matter was not in accordance with reason or with justice or with the plain letter of the law.

When this charge was first spread broadcast over the country an ancient statute was exhumed, under which it was proposed to visit condign punishment upon these malefactors. All the terrors of the law and its majesty were invoked to crush these criminal conspirators who had challenged the power of this great Government and trampled upon its authority. What has become of that statute? What has become of that act which "roared so loud and thundered in the index?" The Senator from Wisconsin thanked God that the President had seen his way clear to uphold the right of the Federal Government to maintain its functions within the States, and to carry on the governmental business, and to enforce the laws of the United States.

I ask him who is maintaining the functions of the Government in the town of Indianola? Who is carrying on the governmental business there? Who is enforcing the law? There is a law upon the statute book which makes it the duty of the President to maintain a post-office at every county seat, including the town of Indianola, and which forbids him to abolish or discontinue it. That is a part of the functions of the Government which the Senator from Wisconsin says it is the President's duty to maintain; that is a part of the governmental business which it is his duty to carry on; that is one of the laws which it is his duty to enforce; yet the Senator thanks God that the President has "seen his way clear" to enforce this law by taking the Indianola post-office and fleeing with it to a distant town, 30 miles away, because of the alleged violence of certain supposititious ruffians who have made imaginary threats!

I ask, Mr. President, if this is worthy the man of the "strenuous life?" He who rode into the jaws of death and the mouth of hell, who showed like Bellona's bridegroom on the red edge of battle, who "the multitudinous seas incarnadined" with the crimson torrent which from the top of San Juan Hill ran bubbling to the main—he abandons his post of duty and flies beaten and discomfited by a little band of ruffians in a little country town! [Laughter.] What "a lame and impotent conclusion" for this strenuous Administration!

The Senator from Wisconsin says that the President has not abolished the post-office at Indianola. Oh, no, Mr. President; he has not abolished it. He has simply taken it under his arm and scuttled with it—carried it away to the town of Greenville.

The President shook a penal statute in the faces of these alleged law breakers; he commanded them to keep the peace; he commanded that they should cease to interfere with the postmaster there, but when they refused to do it he simply took up the post-office and moved away with it. [Laughter.] And that is what the Senator calls enforcing the law, and he thanks God that the President had the manhood to do it.

I think that some sage Dogberry of the Post-Office Department must have been the adviser of the Administration in this weighty business.

You shall comprehend all vagrom men—

Said Judge Dogberry.

You are to bid any man stand, in the prince's name.

The second watch asked:

How, if he will not stand?

To which Dogberry replied:

Why, then, take no note of him, but let him go, and presently call the rest of the watch together and thank God you are rid of a knave.

That is how the President has washed his hands and discharged his conscience of the obligations laid upon him by the laws of the United States. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Wisconsin laid great stress upon the fact, or the alleged fact, that the mayor of the town of Indianola had refused to promise that the postmaster at Indianola would be protected, and this is the main ground upon which the President's action is defended. The Senator read from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall as follows:

No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the Government of the Union on those of the States for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adequate to its ends, and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends.

To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it can not control, which another government may furnish or withhold, would render its course precarious, the results of its measures uncertain, and create dependence on other governments, which might disappoint its most important designs, and is incompatible with the language of the Constitution. (McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S.) * * *

Commenting upon that, the Senator said:

This is vital, and if the Government is not dependent upon the consent of States to the exercise of governmental functions, how much less is it dependent upon the consent of the people of towns, villages, and cities?

All of which, Mr. President, I most potently believe. Yet the very plea upon which the Senator laid so much stress in his argument was that the Government of the United States could not exercise its functions in the town of Indianola because the mayor of that town refused to give assurance that he would support the Government in the conduct of its business and in the execution of its laws. For that very reason the President abandoned all effort to maintain a post-office there.

The Federal Government, says the Senator, is not dependent, and must not be dependent, upon the local authorities in cities, towns, and villages, yet his very plea is that it is so absolutely dependent that it can not exercise its functions unless it has a promise of support from the mayor and town constable of a country village!

The Senator says the sign of sovereignty of the Federal Government in Indianola is the post-office, and he thanked God that the President of the United States had the manhood to uphold that sovereignty by taking down the sign! Where is the sign of the sovereignty of the Federal Government in Indianola now? It was there, and it would be there now if the President had not taken it down and carried it off to Greenville.

Let me read again from this opinion of Chief Justice Marshall:

Its means—

That is, the means of the Federal Government—

Its means are adequate to its ends, and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends.

In the printed report of his speech the Senator lays particular stress on this language by putting it in italics. I wish to emphasize the very same language, because it constitutes the greatest indictment against the action of the President in the removal of the post-office from Indianola:

Its means are adequate to its ends, and on those means alone—

On those means alone—

was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends.

What are those means? Chief Justice Marshall does not leave us in doubt. He tells us in this same opinion from which the Senator read:

The United States may, by means of physical force exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions which belong to it.

That is good law; that is good constitutional wisdom. I indorse every word of it. The Government may "by force" execute its powers and functions. It may "by force" deal with these men who interfere with the conduct of the Government's business. But if the Senator wants to justify the action of the President in this matter, let him bring here some opinion of Chief Justice Marshall which says that the proper way for the President to accomplish the ends of this Government is to abandon all effort to exercise its functions or to execute its laws whenever it meets with threats or resistance on the part of a few individuals.

The Senator said:

The technical ground upon which the war was carried on was the right of the Federal Government to enforce its laws and to protect its property and to carry on governmental business all over the United States.

But, Mr. President, suppose that the Federal Government at that time had acted upon the principle and the line of conduct adopted by President Roosevelt in this case; suppose Abraham Lincoln had said to the people in all the seceding States, "If you do not cease to resist the Federal Government and to defy its authority, then we will withdraw from your States and cease to make any effort to carry on the business of the Government or to enforce its laws among you." If he had acted upon the line of conduct thus laid down by President Roosevelt this country would have been disunited and secession would have triumphed without a blow.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the statute to which I have referred and to which the Senator from Wisconsin, I suppose, referred when he admitted that the President had no right to abolish the office at Indianola, because that was a county seat. The language of the law is—

That no post-office established at any county seat shall be abolished or discontinued by reason of any consolidation of post-offices made by the Postmaster-General under existing law.

Has not that law been violated? The Senator says that the post-office has not been abolished; but has it not been discontinued? Has not a continuance of that office at Indianola been interrupted? If so, Mr. President, then the law laid down in that statute book has been violated by the President. He has undertaken to deal with an unproved and doubtful violation of one law by a plain and palpable violation of another.

Mr. President, I confess I am one of those who have looked with apprehension upon the enormous and aggressive power of the Executive of this country. I have sometimes feared that Congress would become a mere clerical body to register the edicts of the Executive as subserviently as a Roman Senate registered the edicts of the Cæsars. I have sometimes thought that the States were perishing in the shadow of the Federal Government; but if this plea, which has been put forward in behalf of the President, is to be taken as a measure of the strength of the Executive and the dignity of the Federal Government, then this Government at Washington deserves to be despised for its weakness and imbecility rather than feared for its power.

The President has no discretion in this matter. The law says that a post-office at a county seat shall not be abolished or discontinued. It was not intended by that law, Mr. President, to secure simply the name and the shadow of a post-office; it was intended to secure an actual post-office that would give to all of the people in that community the advantage of post-office facilities.

Why has it not been done? The only excuse is that there have been threats of violence; that the Federal Government has met with resistance in its efforts to carry on its business. Before that can be accepted as a plea, Mr. President, the resistance must reach the extent of overwhelming physical force which amounts to a rebellion, and a successful rebellion, against the authority of the United States. Accept the plea that has been made by the Senator in behalf of the Administration, and you must admit that the Federal Government in its efforts to execute the law and to carry on the governmental business in the town of Indianola has met with a resistance with which it can not cope. When we come to see what that resistance is we find from the President's own statement that it comes from a mere handful of alleged desperadoes who have not done anything up to this time except make threats.

This great and mighty Government, this world power, with a strenuous and militant President at its head, recoils, retreats, acknowledges humiliation and defeat before a mere bakers' dozen of unarmed Mississippians, who have never done anything worse than to whittle box tops at a country store! That, sir, is to be taken as the measure of the power and dignity of this great Government in enforcing its laws! Why did not the President say: "I will take my stand here; the law charges me with the duty of maintaining a post-office and carrying on the governmental business here in the town of Indianola, and I intend to do it. This post-office is the property and it is the business of the Government of the United States. Let any man undertake to interfere with it, and on his head I launch the thunderbolts of the law." Is it confessed that he is not able to do it? Is it confessed that a mere handful of alleged ruffians in a little country village are more powerful than this great Government with this militant President at its head? Why does he not enforce the law and punish the guilty? There is only one good reason that can be given, and that is that no law has been violated and there is no man to punish.

Mr. President, I do not desire to go into any elaborate discussion of the race question, which has been discussed so fully and so ably by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but I do think, contrary to what is said sometimes by people in my own part of the country as well as elsewhere, that this question ought to be discussed. I do not agree with those who say that it ought to be left alone to settle itself. If we can reach a time when we can consider the question with an honest purpose, I think it ought to be agitated and I think it ought to be discussed. I had hoped, sir, that the time would come when Senators on both sides of this Chamber would be in the mood and temper calmly and dispassionately to consider the darkest problem that has ever confronted the people of the United States, and a problem which, in my judgment, grows blacker and more ominous as the years go by.

When I learned that an eminent Senator upon the other side of the Chamber had suffered such a reaction from his ancient prejudices as to express his regret that slavery had been abolished in this country, and when the distinguished Secretary of War, speaking, I suppose, for the Administration, declared his belief that the enfranchisement of the negro was a mistake or a failure, I began to feel that we were approaching a time when all of us, without regard to party division, might confront this question with a common wish and a common purpose.

But, Mr. President, the settlement of the race question will not be advanced by forcing the appointment of negro officeholders in the Southern States. You may say it is a blind and an unreasoning prejudice that objects to it. We do not think so. But even a prejudice, if it be a rooted and ineradicable prejudice, is a fixed and immovable fact, and it is the part of a wise statesman to make a place in the law for facts which the law can not budge.

That which you call race prejudice exists in the North just as it does in the South. It is not so rampant among you because, for one reason, you have not so many negroes, and because, in the second place, your Republican Administrations have carefully refrained from provoking race prejudice in your country. Why do you not appoint negro postmasters in the Northern States as well as in the South? How many negro postmasters are there in the President's own State, New York? How many of them are there in the States north of the Mason and Dixon line? How many Senators upon the other side of the Chamber have ever recommended the appointment of a negro for postmaster or for any other office in their own States? How many have ever nominated a colored man for cadet at West Point or Annapolis? And yet, Mr. President, you recognize every other distinct class of voters, whether distinguished by race or by religion or by any other cause. You have offices with which to placate the Irish, and the German, and the Scandinavian, and the Italian, the Protestant, the Catholic, and the Jew; but you have no offices for negroes in your own States.

Yet the negro votes in your State are far more important to you politically than the negro votes in the South. Again and again you have held power by the grace of the negro votes cast in the great pivotal States. Again and again you have carried New York, and New Jersey, and Ohio, and Illinois, and Indiana by the negro votes in those States. Yet you do not dare appoint negroes to office in those States, because you know it would offend the white voters and they would show their displeasure at the polls. You continue to appoint them in the Southern States, though you know you arouse passions and antagonisms which bode no good to the negro, no good to the white man, and no good to the country. You sit apart from this problem and you say, "What strange people these Southerners are!"

Mr. President, we are the same kind of people you are, or would be, under the same circumstances. The Southern people are the purest blooded Americans in this country. They are nearly all the descendants of a colonial ancestry. They are the sons of the sires who conquered the wilderness and laid broad and deep the foundations of American liberty. They are not cruel; they are not bigoted; they do not hate the negro; they sincerely wish him well. But they have this characteristic which is in the blood of their race, in whosoever's veins it may run: They will not divide sovereignty and dominion of their own country with a lower or an inferior race. Offend this prejudice, if you call it so, antagonize it, and the result is strife and hate and bitterness and conflict.

The Secretary of War in a public speech declared that the enfranchisement of the negro had proved to be a failure, and that we must recognize it as such. Then pausing to give emphasis to his statement, he said, "I need say no more." But it is incumbent upon him as the spokesman of the Administration to say more than that, and to tell us what he and the President, as the leader of the dominant party, propose to do or think should be done under the circumstances. If they are not ready to do that, then the best thing they can do is to let this thing alone and to leave it in the keeping of the Southern people, who are the best, I had almost said the only, friends of the negro in this country.

What shall be done in the future I do not know. It was an accursed hour that transplanted the African negro to this American continent and transmitted to future generations a question to which time and the wisdom of man have given no answer.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the Almighty ever intended that two races, so deeply and so radically differentiated, should inhabit the same country or share in the same government. Whom God hath put asunder let no man join together. I do not believe that the white man is fit to have uncontrolled power over the black. I do not believe that the black man is fit to share in the government of the white. Let me say, Mr. President, that as much as I detest imperialism, I would accept it, though with loathing, before I would consent to the proposition sometimes made to admit the Filipinos to statehood in the American Union and give them a hand in controlling the destinies of this great Republic. The violation of God's ordinance which fixed the habitation of the colored man in Africa has been an unmixed curse to the American people. It has been productive of lamentable departures from the true principles of our Government.

Some of us who oppose the policy of this Government in the Philippines have been taunted with the charge that we have not been faithful to our own precepts in our treatment of the negro. The all-sufficient answer is that if in our dealing with a problem which we did not create but inherited there have been enforced departures from the Declaration of Independence, it is unfortunate that it should be so, and it should not serve as a precedent to justify us in deliberately going 7,000 miles away and waging a bloody and costly war to impose the yoke of political slavery upon another people in their own country.

I believe, sir, in the Declaration of Independence. I believe that every people, whatever may be their type or standard of civilization, and in whatever stage of civilization they may be, if left to themselves will find and consent to a form of government best suited to their own needs and better than any outside power can impose upon them. But I believe that no two people, with a different standard and a different type of civilization or in different stages of civilization, can successfully unite in the government of the same country.

The President at one time said it had taken our race a thousand years to develop a capacity for self-government. That was, as I have said before, incorrect and unhistorical. When history first found our Teutonic forefathers in the German wilderness they were a free, democratic, self-governing people. It is a fact that left to themselves they laid the foundations upon which we have reared the magnificent superstructure of government under which we live. It is a fact that they preserved and perpetuated and transmitted to future generations that grand conception of representative free government which all the lawgivers of the past had missed. But it is further true that while they were capable of self-government, even as they were first found, they would not have been fit to share in the government of such a democracy as that of Athens in her prime. We must distinguish between people of different standards and of different types and in different stages of civilization, and we must keep them apart and let each be governed by its own laws in its own country.

Mr. President, I must say frankly, with respect to the race question in the United States, that I have heard no suggestion for its solution that seems to me to be wise or feasible. The one solution upon which the greatest stress is laid is that of education. It seems to me that most that has been said on this line is a mere darkening of counsel by words without knowledge. It seems we have tried not to see this question as it is, for when we strip it stark naked we must admit that it is not merely a question of ignorance or intelligence; not a question of literacy or illiteracy; it is a question of white and black. It is a race question, and we need not attempt to disguise it.

Some time since I read in a newspaper a statement to the effect that the average Southerner imagines he has stated the whole case when he asks his Northern critic if he would be willing for his sister to marry a negro. Foolish and irrelevant as it may seem, that epitomizes the whole question. No well-bred New Englander would be willing for the blood of his family to mingle with that of a negro, no matter how worthy as an individual he might be; and when it is admitted that no amount of mental or moral culture will make possible social equality or intermarriage between the races, then you admit that there is an insuperable and invidious bar between them.

If it shall be the effect of education to make the negro chafe under the white man's assertion of superiority, if it shall make him aspire to that condition of equality in which his race and color will no longer be regarded as badges of inferiority, then it will only complicate the problem. It will only intensify antagonisms between the races.

Let it be said, Mr. President, that social equality means intermarriage. There can be no social equality where it is mutually understood that intermarriage is forbidden by a law, written or unwritten, which takes no note of the character of individuals, but proclaims that all the individuals of one race are superior to all the individuals of another. There can be no social equality that does not admit the right of intermarriage, because it is not social equality if it does not.

Many people in the Northern States have not understood the feeling of outrage and indignation on the part of the Southern people with respect to acts which seemed to admit the negro to terms of social equality. Mr. President, it is simply the instinct of race preservation which revolts at any act tending to break down the barriers that nature has erected between the white man and the black.

While I would not undervalue the effect of education on the mind and character, I must say that those take a very superficial view of this question who imagine that it is any cure whatever for the race question. A literary education is a matter of comparatively easy achievement. The development of character comes by the slow process of evolution. The character of the most highly developed nations and races of men in the world to-day represents the accretions, the inherited and transmitted accretions, of many generations. It can not be expected that a mere book education, mere teaching to read and write, can elevate to a plane of equality with the white man and make capable of the high duties of American citizenship a race which has passed from ages of barbarism through centuries of slavery.

There are people, Mr. President, who think that this question will be solved or that the most acute phase of it will disappear when the color line ceases to be the line of political division in the Southern States. It seems to me, sir, that this will only change the aspect of the question by presenting it in a darker and more sinister form. I understand that it is not a natural or a healthful condition for the intelligence, the culture, the wealth of a State to be all massed in one political party. In such conditions it is impossible that we should have that intellectual rivalry, that wrestling of mind with mind so necessary to develop men of masterful power in thought and leadership. I admit all that is true; but what would be the result if you could break the bonds which attach the negro to the Republican party and if you could divide the white people of the South equally between the two political parties? You would have upon the one hand two evenly matched political organizations, led by eager and active politicians, engaged in a desperate struggle for political supremacy. You would have on the other hand a great mass of venal, corrupt voters, with no enlightened conception of the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, constituting the balance of power.

Such a condition, Mr. President, would be fatal to the morals of any political party. Our election contests would be a riot of corruption. Our politics would be debauched to the last degree. The negro vote, constituting the balance of power, would go to whatever party or candidate would bid the highest or stoop the lowest for its support. We should have a condition in which no man would dare to be a candidate for office if he had any character to lose or unless he had unlimited money to spend.

We know, Mr. President, how far men will go in the stress of politics. We know the progressive power of debauchery. We know how the public conscience is calloused by long contact with corruption. Sir, we have seen one of the fairest in this sisterhood of States debauched and deflowered by the lust of one coarse and vulgar millionaire; and instead of shocking the conscience of every honest man in this country, this Senate to-day is expected to reward with office and with honors one of the instruments of his depravity. More than that, he has the insolence publicly to proclaim that none but his own panders and procurers may expect any favors at the hands of the National Administration.

If these things can be done in a State like Delaware, with such a high type of citizenship, among a people where corruption was practically unknown, what may not be done in States where there are thousands of voters eager to be bribed and without any sense of shame or consciousness of moral delinquency in the transaction? So, Mr. President, I say that while present conditions are unfortunate, it would be tenfold worse, it would be ruinous and destructive to all the Southern States if the white people should ever divide and the colored vote should wield the balance of power.

Mr. President, I am aware that I have suggested no solution for the race question; but the first step in the solution of any problem is to get a clear understanding of its real nature and character, and to put aside all false and delusive remedies. This question, unfortunately, has heretofore been a footfall of party politics. When it has ceased entirely to be a partisan or sectional question; when it is recognized as a question that vitally affects the welfare of the whole nation, then we may look it frankly in the face, and in our united councils we may find wisdom for its solution.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, before I move for an executive session, I desire to say that as the time is getting brief before the session will close, I think it is our duty to meet at an earlier hour. I therefore move that hereafter when the Senate shall adjourn it shall meet, until otherwise ordered, at 11 o'clock instead of 12.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that hereafter, until otherwise ordered, the Senate shall meet at 11 o'clock each day. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION AND MILITARY-RECORD BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, at 5 o'clock, the unobjected pension cases on the Calendar and the cases correcting the records of soldiers be taken up for consideration.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire whether those bills could not be considered at an evening session?

Mr. GALLINGER. I recall the fact that during the last session I made several requests for evening sessions and there was always objection made.

I meant to say, Mr. President, that the order will not interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. To-morrow is a day when there ought to be a good deal of business transacted, and I think we might have an evening session for pension matters.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say frankly that for myself I will not be here at an evening session during the present session.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the request of the Senator from New Hampshire may be granted.

Mr. GALLINGER. However, some one else might take charge of the matter.

Mr. CULLOM. It is that at 5 o'clock to-morrow unobjected pension bills, etc., shall be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that at 5 o'clock to-morrow the Senate shall consider unobjected pension cases and bills for the correction of military records. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 25, 1903, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 24, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the special order for to-day.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 7412. An act to amend the second section of an act entitled "An act providing that the circuit court of appeals of the eighth judicial circuit court of appeals of the eighth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado, or in the city of Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, on the first Monday in September in each year, and at the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, on the first Monday in May in each year," approved June 9, 1902; and

S. 5369. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles R. Allen.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the blll (S. 4850) to increase the pension of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States, or are totally disabled in the same.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under cause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 7414. An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 5369. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles R. Allen—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 7412. An act to amend the second section of an act entitled "An act providing that the circuit court of appeals of the eighth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado, or in the city of Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, on the first Monday in September in each year, and at the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, on the first Monday in May in each year," approved June 9, 1902—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PHILIPPINE CURRENCY.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the bill H. R. 15520, "A bill to establish a standard of value and to provide for a coinage system in the Philippine Islands," with Senate amendments and amendments of the Committee on Insular Affairs, be made the special order for Tuesday next immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this bill be limited to two hours, one hour of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and the other hour to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and one hour by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That means general debate, of course, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. That is the meaning of the request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the bill which passed the House some weeks ago is returned from the Senate with nothing remaining but the number and the title, the Senate having stricken out all after the enacting clause and substituted an entirely new measure. The bill as it now comes to the House does not differ in principle, though it does somewhat in detail, from the bill originally reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs. It provides in the first section for the coinage of a gold piece of one-half the weight of the United States gold dollar, that is to be called a gold peso, and become the standard of value in the Philippine Islands.

The silver peso provided in the Senate bill here pending is to be received as the equivalent of the gold peso. There is no difference, it will be apparent to the House, in principle between this bill and the bill as originally reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs. That bill provided that the United States gold dollar should be the standard of value, and that the Philippine silver peso should be received for it at the ratio of 2 to 1. This bill provides for a gold unit of value of one-half the weight and fineness of the United States gold dollar, and makes the ratio between it and the silver peso 1 to 1.

Before proceeding with the discussion of the bill I desire to correct some erroneous impressions caused by statements made here in debate on the bill when it was last before the House. It will be remembered that the attention of the House was many times called during that debate, by friends of the bill, to the fact that the initial suggestion for this legislation came from the Philippine Commission, the Taft Commission, in its report of 1900. It was also many times called to the attention of the House that the Philippine Commission were now strongly in favor of the principle of that bill. The force of that declaration, however, was very much weakened before the debate ended, by the assertion made by opponents of the measure that Governor Taft, the head and front of the Commission, had written a letter to a member of the House in which he practically retracted the testimony given by him before the Committee on Insular Affairs, in which he had said that, in his opinion, the introduction of American money into the Philippine Islands "would result in nothing short of disaster."

The letter which was read from him contained a clause in which he said, "I do not insist"—that is, upon the Conant system of the gold-dollar of the United States as a unit—"but I think it is the most feasible." That expression was interpreted to mean that all Governor Taft now wanted in the way of financial legislation for the islands was something that would establish the gold standard, the inference being perfectly clear that Governor Taft had become indifferent as to whether the money of the United States or the coinage proposed by the Insular Committee in its bill was sent there.

On page 1115 of the debate I find this statement by the gentleman from Connecticut:

He says to me that he does not insist on the proposition; that all he wants is legislation giving us a gold standard.

I replied to this suggestion, as the RECORD shows, by saying that Governor Taft had not at all changed his views as to the advisability of putting United States money into the archipelago, and I said that no fair construction of his letter would involve that interpretation. I said that—

Governor Taft is a wise, high-minded man, who knows the duty of an executive and the duties of a legislator. "Insist" is a strong word. He does not "insist" before the American House of Representatives that any plan which he favors shall be adopted.

Referring to the proposition to introduce American money, I said:

But did he indorse the plan? Not at all. He knew of the testimony of the gentleman from Connecticut before the Committee on Insular Affairs, and therefore was well aware that the gentleman from Connecticut is a strenuous advocate of a system in which the Governor does not believe. The Governor adheres, in so far as his silence can be considered as adherence, to his testimony, which is that to attempt to establish that in those islands would result in nothing short of disaster. There is no modification of that statement.

Since that debate and since the bill passed the House of Representatives and went to the Senate Governor Taft has telegraphed to the Secretary of War in relation to the measure. His cablegram, which is dated the 5th of the present month, is part of a Senate document, and I will read it:

MANILA, February 5, 1903.

SECRETARY OF WAR, Washington, D. C.:

Official ratio Mexican dollars to United States currency now $2.66 to $1; total direct net loss to insular treasury from depreciation silver since January 1, 1902, $1,277,941.91.

All business suffering greatly from fluctuation and depreciation insular treasury; immense losses to merchants who have sold on credit. Failure to furnish relief at this session of Congress would create consternation throughout the islands; added to prevailing financial depression, loss of animals by rinderpest and other contagious diseases, and resulting destitution, the political situation would become more difficult.

I call the attention of the House to this language—

The political situation would become more difficult.

That is a very conservative way to put it.

The political situation would become more difficult.

The adoption American money would enhance prices greatly and derange every form of business. Legislation making gold peso equal one-half American dollar as unit of value, peso and subsidiary minor coinage receivable for all public dues at the rate of 50 cents American money for 1 peso, with provision for issuance silver certificates based on deposit of new pesos, would furnish a currency as good as American money and much better adapted to needs of the islands.

The Philippine Commissioners are unanimous in these views.

TAFT.

So it seems that the interpretation which I, in common with other friends of the then pending bill, put upon the letter of Governor Taft was entirely correct; that he had not at all changed his views as to the unwisdom of adopting the coinage system of the United States, although he did not "insist," as an executive has no right to "insist," that the legislature must enact such a law as he thought best.

We were also told—and it created much effect here in the House—that Mexico was here on that very day, while that debate was in progress, through its representative, endeavoring to secure from the United States an agreement to enter into an international agreement for the establishment of a parity between silver and gold, this international agreement to be entered into by silver-standard countries and gold-standard countries, and that Mexico was desirous, herself, of establishing a coinage system to correspond exactly to ours.

Now, that statement was also erroneous. Mexico has never made a proposition to establish a ratio like that which now obtains in the United States. Her only proposition, and the only proposition of China—and I have them both here—is to establish a system like the one embodied or proposed to be established in the Philippine coinage bills then pending, respectively, in the House and in the Senate. The proposition of Mexico has since been sent to the Senate by the Secretary of State. I have it here, and will read an extract from it:

It is recognized by this Government that bimetallism in the sense of the free coinage of both metals is a policy which has been definitely discarded by leading powers of Europe and by the United States, and that it would be futile to ask its restoration.

It is therefore not the expectation nor the wish of this Government that the gold-standard countries should take any action tending to impair their monetary standard, or to make material changes in their monetary systems. It is desired that the governments of gold countries having dependencies where silver is used, and the governments of silver countries shall cooperate in formulating some plan for establishing a definite relationship between their gold and silver moneys, and shall take proper measures to maintain such relationship. One such plan has already been proposed in both Houses of the Congress of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands.

Very different would have been the effect upon the House if that statement had been made instead of the statement which was made, that Mexico was here, through her representative, endeavoring to establish a system which would bring it exactly to that of the United States, the inference being that she wished to go upon the coinage ratio of 16 to 1. That is what I thought, as did other members of the House. Then, says the Mexican memorandum:

It seems that it would contribute materially to the permanent and satisfactory settlement of this problem if Great Britain and France, with their important colonial possessions in Asia, and if Germany, Russia, and other countries having large commercial and territorial interests there, would unite with the United States and Mexico in the adoption of a common standard for a new coinage system in the silver countries.

Quite a different impression to be derived from that memorandum and the one which the House obtained from what was said here during debate on this proposition three or four weeks ago.

Mr. Speaker, the bill proposes that this silver peso shall be just like the Mexican peso now there in weight, size, and fineness, but that there shall be upon it a superscription to denote the sovereignty of the United States. Governor Taft said that what the Commission were extremely desirous of doing was to disarrange the coinage system of the islands as little as possible; that they wanted a coin of the same size, weight, and fineness as near as possible, because, as he said, the Filipinos, like all oriental peoples, are much devoted to names and traditions. Therefore, the bill would keep the coin of the same size, fineness, and weight, but make it worth 50 cents in gold. And how? In accordance with an indisputable and everywhere recognized law of finance that limitation in coinage, together with the fact that that limited coinage is receivable for debts, public and private, will hold it at par.

That is the experience of all countries. It is the experience of France. It is the experience of the United States. The United States silver dollar has never been at a discount, but for years its coinage has been limited. As I before called to the attention of the House, in a document issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in 1900, on page 18, he says: "Gold and silver dollars, being standard coins of the United States, are not redeemable." And yet they never have been at a discount. What kept them at par? Limitation in coinage and the fact that they were to be received for debts, public and private. There is an illustration of the effect of this law of finance to be found in the history of the existing Philippine coinage. Their coinage consists of 40,000,000 pesos. Six millions of these pesos are Spanish-Filipino pesos, coined by Spain, and the Spanish Government not being in authority in the islands there can be no further coinage of that particular peso.

Yet those Spanish-Filipino pesos, which have from 20 to 25 grains less in weight of silver than the Mexican peso, have always floated at par with the Mexican peso. Why? Because they are just as good for all purposes and the coinage is limited. A person can pay just as many debts with them. They are just as welcome in the hands of the people in the provinces and in the hands of the business men throughout the archipelago as is the Mexican coin, and thus it is only when two precious metals are coined in unlimited quantities that the parity between them can not be maintained. Under this bill the amount of coinage is to be limited by the Philippine government. To maintain its parity with gold there is by construction conferred upon the Philippine Commission by the bill, or will be if it is enacted into law, six powers. These were specifically enumerated in the bill of a year ago, but that specific enumeration is not at all necessary, because the bill provides that the government of the Philippine Islands "may adopt such measures as it may deem proper," not inconsistent with the act of July 1, 1902, to maintain the parity of the silver peso with gold.

They can, in their discretion, pay gold for silver or silver for gold, or transfer any of the current funds in the Treasury to the currency-redemption fund, or sell gold drafts on the United States, or issue certificates under a special authority granted by the bill. But the experts who have been before us say that that limitation in quantity in and of itself is practically enough to keep these coins at par. There will be not more than 40,000,000 of them coined. There are about 40,000,000 there now, and it is not proposed, of course, as they are to be maintained at par, greatly to increase at once the aggregate amount of pesos in the islands. Taxes and customs duties demand about 20,000,000 of pesos a year, so that one peso in every two will be going into the coffers of the government each year. Thus there will be a constant and great demand for these pesos. The rest of them will be in demand by the people generally throughout the provinces and by the wholesale and retail houses in Manila, Iloilo, and other large cities. Limitation in coinage, the constant demand for it, and the powers conferred upon the Philippine Commission will suffice absolutely to insure the parity of these coins with gold.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. McCALL. I would like to inquire, for the benefit of those of us who thought the House bill was a better measure than the Senate bill, but who still think that the Senate bill is very much better under the present conditions than no legislation at all, what, in the opinion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, would be the practical prospect of legislation if the two Houses should at this stage get into a disagreement over this subject?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, speaking for myself, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it would seem very problematical, to put it conservatively, whether any financial legislation could be enacted for the Philippine Islands during the present session if this bill should fail. I did not wish to volunteer that statement, because I was charged with having made a threat when I simply gave utterance to a similar opinion during the other debate.

Mr. McCALL. I simply asked for the gentleman's opinion on the subject.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is my opinion.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Have you any information from Judge Taft as to the effect in the Philippine Islands of a failure of action by Congress on this measure?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is a cablegram under date of February 5 from Governor Taft, that I read a few moments ago, in which he vividly depicts the condition of financial distress in the islands, and says:

> Failure to furnish relief at this session of Congress would create consternation throughout the islands. Added to prevailing financial depression, loss of animals by rinderpest and other contagious diseases, and resulting destitution, the political situation would become more difficult.

And no American patriot wants it to become any more difficult than it is at this hour.

To return to the question which has been raised as to the maintenance of parity with gold of coin issued under the conditions proposed by the bill, I have here the testimony of Mr. Roberts, Mr. Conant, Mr. Hollander, and many others, taken before the Committee on Insular Affairs, in which they, one and all, declare that the system proposed by the bill is identical in principle with the coinage system of India. Here is what Mr. Conant said:

> Now, the Indian government, when it undertook, in 1899, to establish the parity of silver rupees by means of a gold reserve, gave to that country exactly the powers granted by the bill of Mr. COOPER to the government of the Philippine Islands.
> There was no mandate upon the Indian government to pay gold upon demand; they did not propose to do it.

He embodied in his testimony an extract from an official report of an officer of the Indian government. The Indian government official says:

> We have been frequently told, and with perfect justice, that we could never claim to have a true gold standard in India until we were prepared to exchange gold for rupees as well as rupees for gold. By being prepared to exchange I do not mean that we should accept a legal liability to give gold for rupees, but that in practice, as, for example, in France, anybody who wanted gold for internal purposes should be able to obtain gold freely, without let or hindrance.

It is the testimony of expert witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Insular Affairs that one can not obtain gold at the Bank of France ad libitum for export. The Bank of France retains the discretion, just as we propose by this bill to allow the Commission in the Philippines to retain the discretion, to pay gold on demand or not to pay it. The Commission may and will pay out gold when the demand is for legitimate purposes; but they ought not to be compelled to pay gold when the demand is a mere raid on the treasury by professional gold brokers.

Says the official of the Indian government:

> Theorists, indeed, argue that neither France nor the United States possesses a gold standard in the full and complete sense of the words.
>
> But I think no one will dispute that if we can advance to the same position as France we shall have attained a gold standard for all practical purposes. A year ago it seemed that we should probably have to sit for a long while under the reproach of our critics and put up with what has been termed an "exchange standard." It then appeared impossible that in twelve months we should be paying out gold to anybody who asked for it. We are doing so now. Whether we shall be able to continue to do so without check or interruption, whether now we have once started giving gold for rupees we may not have to suspend temporarily, is not a matter about which confident prediction can be made. But it would be reasonable to say that the auguries are not unfavorable for our being able to pursue the path on which we have entered.

Mr. Conant continues:

> That, I believe, would be the experience of the Philippine government. Reserving the right to refuse gold upon mere arbitrary demand for hoarding, they would find the demands so few for legitimate purposes that they would be able to meet them without difficulty.

The same Indian official reported that instead of there being any trouble in India to procure sufficient gold they imported in two years $50,000,000 in gold, and that the government had more than there was any actual demand for.

The limitation of coinage and the fact that it is received for debts, public and private, maintains the parity of silver with gold in India, as it does in France and as it will in the Philippines.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill as amended by the Committee on Insular Affairs is in its main and essential features the measure which the Committee on Insular Affairs originally reported to this House and which was here rejected by the emphatic and decisive vote of 146 to 128. I need scarcely occupy the time of the House for the purpose of demonstrating this fact, for that much is conceded. The report of the Committee on Insular Affairs, which accompanies and recommends the adoption of this Senate measure, makes that admission in so many words. This is the language of the report:

> In principle the bill does not differ from the bill as originally reported to the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House is confronted with this proposition: On the 22d day of January last a measure which did not differ either in principle or in any essential particular from that which is now before the House was carefully considered, was debated at length, and was rejected by it. The substitute measure then adopted by the House, and which was sent to the Senate, has never been considered by that body; but a measure, as I have said, practically embodying the same provisions, and identically the same in principle as the rejected committee bill, was substituted in the Senate for the House bill; and the question now before the House of Representatives is whether or not, after having taken this position, it will face about and accept the bill which a month ago it overwhelmingly rejected.

The Senate amendment to the House bill contains one provision, however, which has not found favor with the Committee on Insular Affairs. The fourteenth section of that amendment or bill, a new section added in the Senate, provides that the President of the United States shall invite the Governments of England, France, and Germany, and such other gold-using nations as he may deem proper, and the Governments of Mexico, China, and such other silver-using countries as he may desire to include, to appoint representatives to meet like representatives to be appointed by him, at the city of Washington, or some other place, with a view to agreeing upon some international ratio between the gold coin of the gold-standard countries and the silver coin of the silver-using countries. This is the chief particular in which the Senate measure now before us differs from that so emphatically rejected by this House. And yet the Committee on Insular Affairs is so tenacious of its opinion, so anxious that the House shall reverse the verdict which it recorded a month ago, that it even rejects that well-intentioned but harmless amendment of the Senate, and reports in favor of a bill, as I have said, which is almost identical with the one rejected in the House.

The Committee on Insular Affairs propose another amendment, which relates to the manner in which debts contracted prior to the 31st day of December, 1903, shall be paid. I believe that that is a proper amendment. I believe that it really improves the Senate measure, and if it be the purpose of the House to reverse its former action then this amendment is proper and should, in my opinion, be adopted.

As to the other amendment, that providing for a silver commission, I for one care absolutely nothing about it. I believe that its author introduced it in good faith. Indeed, I believe that if the object which its author desires through it to attain could be accomplished it would result in great good to the commercial nations of the world. In other words, I believe that if it were possible through any international commission to fix a ratio of exchange between gold and silver, such as would be accepted and acted upon by the commercial nations of the world, that it would be most beneficial to commerce the world over. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that it is the intention of the representatives of the Republican party, either in this body or in the Senate, to permit this amendment to remain upon the bill. It has served its purpose, and the Committee on Insular Affairs now recommend its rejection, as was to have been anticipated, and I have no idea the Senate will insist upon its being retained in their bill. Therefore, believing as I do that from my standpoint it matters little whether it stays in or goes out, I am quite indifferent as to its fate. I shall vote for it because the object which it purports to have in view is a good one.

There are, Mr. Speaker, two or three other changes made in the Senate to the House measure as originally reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs. As the chairman of the committee has stated, the Senate bill provides that there shall be a gold peso, containing 12.9 grains of gold; in other words, a Philippine gold coin containing just one-half the number of grains of gold that are contained in an American gold dollar. But the most peculiar and unaccountable thing about this gold peso is this: Although this bill expressly makes it the unit of value in the Philippine Islands, it does not provide that it shall be legal tender in the islands.

I call the attention of gentlemen upon that side of the aisle to this anomalous condition of affairs. Truly, nothing could exceed the absurdity of this proposition. All of the money current in the Philippine Islands shall be measured by this diminutive coin, to be called a gold peso, and yet no man can take one of them and tender it in payment of a debt, public or private. It is absolutely devoid of legal-tender quality.

But I want to direct the attention of the House, especially of those 28 Republicans who one month ago voted against the bill reported by the Insular Affairs Committee, to the fact that that committee has now reported with a favorable recommendation a Senate measure practically the same as that which was rejected. A measure which, at least in one respect, it must, I think, be admitted is not so good as the House bill which was so decisively defeated. The bill expressly defines in its first section what money shall be legal tender in the Philippine Islands, namely, the gold coins of the United States, and the silver, not the gold, pesos to be coined under its provisions.

The gold peso, the intrinsic value of which is just one-half of that of our gold dollar, and which contains just one-half of the gold contained in our gold dollar, is not a legal tender in the Philippine Islands, although it is a Philippine coin. This, I say, is a remarkable omission in this bill; for I, for one, can not conceive why there should be created in the Philippine Islands a gold unit of value when there is no provision made for the coinage of that unit, and when, even if it were coined, it would not be receivable in payment of debts, either public or private. There is one respect, at least, in which the Senate bill is an improvement upon that which the Insular Affairs Committee asked this House to accept; but which it refused most emphatically to accept.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Do I understand that this bill provides that the gold peso shall be a unit of value, but does not provide for the coinage of any of it?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It neither provides for its coinage nor does it provide that it shall be a legal tender. On the contrary, it expressly provides what shall be the legal-tender money of the islands.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What is the legal tender?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The gold coin of the United States and the silver pesos provided for in this bill. The subsidiary silver provided for in the bill is to be legal tender up to and not exceeding the amount of $10.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The silver peso is a legal tender, but the gold peso is not?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That is true. The silver peso is to be measured by the gold peso, and yet the silver peso is the legal tender and the gold peso is not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by my friend from Kentucky I was about to call attention to another change in the House committee bill made in the Senate measure. The House committee bill did not limit the amount of the silver pesos that might be coined by the Philippine government. That was one of the objections urged by me to that measure when it was under consideration in this House. This Senate bill does, in a measure, correct that evil; it does provide that there shall not be coined by the Philippine government more than seventy-five millions of silver pesos. In still another respect the Senate bill differs from the House committee bill. The House bill provided that the Philippine government might issue and sell certificates of indebtedness not to exceed in amount $5,000,000, in order to secure the gold with which to maintain the parity between its silver currency and gold. This bill doubles that amount, and provides that the government shall have the right to issue for this purpose certificates of indebtedness, redeemable in gold, to the amount of $10,000,000, or 20,000,000 pesos, and further provides, as the House bill did not do, that these certificates shall be exempt from all taxation, Philippine, Federal, State, and municipal.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the material differences between the House committee bill and the Senate bill, and therefore I am entirely correct in saying that there is no difference in principle between this Senate bill and that which the House has already refused to pass, and for which, upon my motion, it substituted a bill extending to the Philippine Islands, which have now become a part of the territory of the United States, the money which is lawful in the United States.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House briefly to one other matter. The only criticism which I have known to be directed against the House measure, that adopted in this House and sent to the Senate, was that it would disturb and disarrange business conditions in the islands. I am free to admit that any currency bill which Congress might pass providing a new system of currency for those islands would, for the time being, have the effect of disturbing to some extent business conditions there.

But I can not see how the measure which has passed this House could possibly have as disastrous an effect as the measure which is now before us. As a matter of fact, the American money which the House bill declares shall be legal tender in the Philippine Islands is already in those islands. It is, moreover, to-day the unit of value in the Philippine Islands, made so by decree of the Philippine government, and the last proclamation which I have seen relating to the subject declares that $1 in American money shall be equal to $2.66 in Philippine silver, or, rather, that 100 American dollars shall be exchangeable for 266 of the Mexican or Spanish pesos, now the silver currency of the islands.

So that the American money is already in the Philippines and is actually the unit of value in the Philippine Islands. Why not, then, declare it to be also the legal-tender money of the islands? Every monetary transaction in those islands to-day is measured by our standard; and if American money is made legal tender, as it is to-day the standard of value there, then every contract made by the Philippine government will be made payable in the currency of the United States, and that government can not then possibly lose a dollar by reason of any fluctuation in the rate of exchange.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who have always believed that if we are going to hold these islands, the money as well as the Constitution of the United States should follow our flag there. I have never believed, however, that we should hold them permanently. I have never believed that we could forcibly set up a carpetbag government there and bring to the Filipinos peace, good order, and contentment. Thus far the experiment has proven a dismal and an expensive failure. It has resulted in nothing but colossal expenditure of money and humiliation to the American people, and we have but recently been called upon to contribute millions of American money to relieve the distress and suffering of the Philippine people—to furnish them the food with which to avert impending starvation.

I find, Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Post of this morning an admirable article upon this subject—an article which I think truthfully sets forth the conditions in the Philippine Islands—and although I do not wholly accept its conclusions I do believe it describes with absolute faithfulness the conditions which to-day exist in those islands. I ask the Clerk to read, as part of my remarks, the editorial which I have marked and which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

BE FRANK ABOUT THE PHILIPPINES!

Yesterday's press reports from Manila did not surprise anyone who is well informed as to the true situation in the Philippines. It was, in fact, expected. Officially, the fighting Filipinos are "ladrones" and our soldiers are "constabulary." The truth is that the so-called "ladrones" are not footpads and highwaymen, nor do the alleged "constabulary" represent anything which in this or any other country would be regarded as a civil government. It is high time to brush away the humbug and the nonsense.

During the past four years, at frequent but irregular intervals, we have been told that organized resistance has disappeared; that nothing is left of the "insurrection" save a "few scattering bands of criminals;" that the people have received our benign rule with affection and gratitude; that we have nothing now to consider excepting the miserable, starving fugitives who lurk in the interior fastnesses, and who need not count in our philosophy. Time and time again we have received the very highest assurance that the Philippines, especially Luzon, are at peace, and we have been asked to contemplate the beneficent régime of the Commission, with its complicated machinery of justice, its enlightened and far-reaching system of education, and its softening and uplifting influence upon the benighted natives. But we have never seen one of these halcyon proclamations that was not effectually contradicted within a week, nor do we believe there has been a time during the past four years when a white man's life was safe a few miles beyond the walls of Manila. More than that, we doubt whether any civil official or any private individual known to be an American could ride or walk along a side street after midnight in the capital itself without risk of his life.

Why not be frank? Why persist in maintaining this wantonly expensive travesty of civil government in the Philippines when, as a matter of fact, neither the commissioners themselves nor any one of their thousands of subordinates and stipendiaries could live five minutes without the protection of the Army? When President Grant, in 1877, withdrew his bayonets and cannon, every carpetbag government in the South collapsed as if by magic. The same thing would happen to-day in the Philippines were the War Department to recall our military forces from the islands. Even as things are, the effort to maintain this farce serves only to dilute the one effective agency of civilization we have at our disposal there. The Army is employed to bolster up the poor semblance of a civil government, and its greatest usefulness is destroyed by the arrangement which subordinates it to a sham.

Why not be frank? Why not put our best foot foremost and cut short a pretense which is both costly and ridiculous?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I am not willing to accept the conclusions reached by the editorial writer of the Post. I do not, for instance, want to see Gen. Jacob Smith sent back to the Philippine Islands and placed in command there. I do not want to see the atrocities which were perpetrated under his cruel and shameless orders in the island of Samar repeated in the island of Luzon. But I do maintain that the statements of fact contained in that article are absolutely true and correct; that they are under rather than over stated, and every intelligent man who has read that editorial in to-day's Post and is at all familiar with the situation in those islands, must admit that it correctly portrays the humiliating, and, to us, most discreditable conditions there.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, permit me again to say that the House of Representatives one month ago yesterday, I believe, by the largest recorded vote that we have had during this whole session of Congress, and after full debate and full consideration, voted down a bill which in all essential particulars and in principle is precisely the measure we are now asked to enact into law.

Am I not, then, justified in asking you to reject this Senate bill and to insist upon the passage of that which, after the maturest consideration and full debate, you declared by your votes was a better measure? I appeal to those Republicans who four weeks ago had the courage of their convictions, who then had the courage to withstand the appeals of their party leaders, to stand up once more like men and to vote according to their honest convictions and their best judgment. I appeal to them to be consistent as well as courageous. You know that the measure which was adopted in this House by the aid of your votes has never been given a moment's consideration in the Senate. You have repudiated the principle embodied in this Senate bill. Are you prepared now to accept at the hands of another branch of Congress that which you rejected with emphasis in this branch?

I think I can speak for those upon this side of the aisle who voted for the measure which passed this House, when I affirm that they will to a man vote for it again. I hope the result of the roll call which will be had will demonstrate that the Republicans who stood shoulder to shoulder with them a month ago have not seen "new light" since that time, and that they will not now reverse their action, and give their support to a measure which they earnestly and indignantly repudiated upon that occasion. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the rest of my time. How much have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty-two minutes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I hope that the chairman of the committee will use some of his time now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has twenty-four minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should like the gentleman from Virginia to use some more of his time.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has so fully covered this question that I scarcely know what to say in addition to what has already been said. The only thing that I would desire to impress upon the House is the question upon which we are to vote. Some two or three weeks ago we voted to substitute United States currency for the currency that now exists in the Philippine Islands. We so voted by a fair majority in this House. That bill was sent to the Senate, and, so far as I know, was never considered or even recognized there, except the caption of the bill. Under the conditions that were prevailing over there at that time no debate could be had upon this subject. So the expressed will of the House has never been before the Senate of the United States. The committee represented by gentlemen on the other side have simply taken up the majority bill, which you on this side of the House refused to accept and voted down, and have offered, with a few amendments, and in the form of a substitute, the bill which you rejected.

We are here to-day asking you to stand by your vote as you voted upon this matter when it was originally brought before the House. That is what we want to impress upon the House. That is what we want you to understand—that we are asking you to vote down this measure and insist upon the bill that we passed four weeks ago.

Now, by some process of parliamentary law which I do not understand, as I freely admit, they have brought this bill back here. It has not gone into conference, and the will of the House as expressed here has not been expressed anywhere except here. It has not been impressed upon the other body. It has not been presented to them by anybody at all. If you accept the substitute, or, in other words, the bill that is presented here to-day by the majority of this House, that concludes the whole thing. If you vote that down, then we can go into a committee of conference and present the bill which we passed four weeks ago.

Now, that is the issue we have before us. The gentleman has sent to the Speaker's desk an editorial from the Post—"Be frank about the Philippines." I think it is about time that we were frank about them, and I want to say now in this connection that I do not believe that any constabulary or police force of the Philippines or any troops of the Philippines that the United States are paying to-day are loyal to this Government or ever will be until they are subdued emphatically and absolutely; and if it is the purpose of this Government to retain these islands, it is our duty to send Federal troops, American soldiers, down there, men who will subdue these brigands and these outlaws and wipe them off the face of the earth and establish a civil government in fact and not in name. If it is the purpose of the Government, as I say, to accept this situation, then we ought to do it. I am the only man on this side of the House, and, with one or two exceptions, on that side of the House, who opposed this idea of our Government becoming involved in war with Spain.

I did not want to go into war; I did not want to attend to somebody else's business. I thought we had enough of our own. I think my judgment has been fully vindicated by this Philippine business. I do not believe that there is a man in Congress to-day, on either side of either body, the Senate or the House, who would to-day, if we had not already acquired these islands, vote to acquire them now and add them to our Government. But we have done so; we have gone on and we have annexed them. They are part of our territory; and now, if we are to maintain our honor and integrity in these islands, we have to do it by United States troops, and not rely upon those people. You may rest assured of that fact. I am not a prophet, but I believe I have got common sense, and I further believe that if we had our cavalry down there—enough of them—these brigands could be subdued.

It is said by some people in this country that these people are not brigands, but that is said by the people who are fighting for the liberty of the Philippine Islands. Those people there have fought for this liberty for three hundred years, and what right have we to anticipate that they will cease to do so whenever they have an opportunity? If we are to do business—in other words, if we are to annex these people, if we are to have a civilized government and a peaceful government—they must be subdued, and this idea of presenting the fact to the country that these people have already been pacified and that peace prevails is ridiculous.

Every telegram that comes to this country shows to the contrary, shows that that is not true, and I say to you people on the other side if you propose to carry out your policy you have got to do it by American troops, and the sooner you do it the better it will be for the United States Government. [Applause.]

I think that is all I desire to say, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be given ten minutes, regardless of any division of time on the Democratic or Republican side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the order heretofore made may be so modified that he be allowed to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say a single word in regard to this measure to-day. If the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs had not devoted most of his time to an attack upon me and a reply to arguments I made a month ago, I should not have said a word. I hoped that he would explain the bill, so that the Republicans who voted in favor of American money the last time this matter was before the House would understand what changes had been made in the bill as now presented to them for their consideration.

I propose to take three or four minutes in making such explanations. If those who had the bill in their hands will refer to it, I will endeavor to show the difference between the measure now before us and the measure on which we voted, or against which some of us voted, a month ago. In the first place, the legal-tender silver peso, which is authorized by this act, is not made a full, unlimited legal tender, as was the silver peso of the House bill, but there is a clause added in the Senate measure by which it is made a full legal tender, "except where otherwise specifically provided in the contract." That is one change, and a very important one. Again, the amount of certificates which can be used for the maintenance of parity between the two coins is increased from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000, a very important change, as gentlemen will see in a coinage of somewhere near 40,000,000 pesos—in other words, multiplying by 100 per cent the instrumentalities for maintaining parity. In the third place, the interest upon those certificates of indebtedness is fixed definitely at 4 per cent, whereas, under the House bill it provided for any interest considered reasonable. These are the principal changes that have been made in the bill. They are very important ones.

Now, why do I not continue to oppose it? And I am talking to those Republicans with whom I had the honor to vote, according to our conscientious convictions. Why do I not continue to oppose it? I should continue to oppose it if it was six weeks earlier in the session. But it seems to me that we have come to the point where it is either temporary purgatory for the Philippine Islands or eternal damnation for the United States. Under those circumstances I prefer to let the Philippine Islands suffer temporarily rather than to have the United States's coinage system forever destroyed. For there are two propositions that come to us, gentlemen. One is a 32 to 1 coinage in the Philippine Islands, and accompanied with it a proposition to demoralize and debauch ultimately the coinage system of the United States. For, if we are confronted to-day by a solid vote of the United States Senate in favor of a proposition to begin an international new bimetallic ratio of 32 to 1, what would be the effect of that proposition if not killed now? But coming up to us in another year, in the face of a presidential election, fortified and strengthened by a favorable report of such a commission, to me the coinage that we shall enact for the Philippine Islands sinks into absolute insignificance compared with the importance of this measure against which this committee has unanimously reported. That is my reason.

And it was equally unkind for the chairman of this committee, knowing how I have been hampered in this matter, to attack me as he has this morning; as it was for the chairman of the Senatorial committee, when this matter was up last week in the Senate, to attempt to read the members of this House a lecture as to the propriety of their action in voting their conscientious convictions, as they saw fit.

Now, that is the situation. That is the position in which we are. We have got to take this measure as it is, as sent to us by the Senate, or we have got to strike out this international commission and let the other go. Now, what would I do with the other? If I had the opportunity I would amend it. How? I will tell you how. It has been said over and over and over again that this is the proposition recommended by Mr. Peabody. Not at all. Mr. Peabody is a gold-standard sound-money man, and his proposition looks to the maintenance of a gold reserve and the absolute exchangeability of gold for silver by the Philippine treasury. That is not here, and it ought to be here. You and I know they can not maintain parity there without it. It is not here.

Another proposition I would have amended is this: It will take a year and a half or two years to put this plan into effect. They have got to establish a mint there, they have got to get a large number of officials and mechanics over there. How long is it going to take to do it? Furthermore, they would be hampered under the terms of this bill in buying silver bullion. They buy on a rising market 75,000,000 pesos, or whatever they get. And then, afterwards, in throwing their Mexican pesos and Spanish coin on the market they sell on a falling market and the insular government will suffer both ways. Now, I would put in there a proposition that the United States Government should be permitted to take the bullion in the Treasury, coin that in our mints where we have abundant capacity to do it, send it over there and take up the other coin, just as we did in Porto Rico and Hawaii, and bring the other coin back here at its gold bullion value and resubstitute it, the Philippine government paying all the expenses of the transaction, and cleaning it all up in six months. But I can not get an opportunity to offer these amendments. I have not the slightest idea that I can, for the previous question will be demanded.

But, gentlemen, under the circumstances, it seems to me that every man on this floor, with these two propositions pending before him, must use his own individual judgment as to what in the end is the best, not for the Philippine Islands, but for our own people in the United States. That is the question that comes to me. That is the question on which I am taking this position to-day. I do not care what the consequences may be in regard to the Philippine Islands. I stand here first, last, and all the time against any renewal of any attempt to go through the miserable farce that we played from 1892 up to 1898 on the silver question. I believe in killing this snake while he is young and not waiting until he is full grown and have another tussle with him as we did in 1896. For that reason I reserve my own freedom of individual action on this question to-day.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I like very much the tone of the speech just made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. It contains the spirit that ought to actuate all members of the House in their attempt to get together upon important items of legislation.

The science of politics is not an exact science. If it were we might resort to approved formulæ for various measures and have them exactly right in every respect. But politics is decidedly speculative, and in view of its speculative character most measures must be the result of concession and compromise. If no member of the House voted for a bill of any character that did not meet his views in all respects there would be absolutely no legislation, and popular government would have to be abandoned.

Now, I confess, Mr. Speaker, that there is a great deal of force in the argument that the American coinage as it exists in this country to-day ought to be extended to the Philippine Islands. There is not only much force in the argument, but that policy has been the historical policy of the country. I was imbued most strongly with the same view when the Committee on Insular Affairs entered upon the investigation of this important question, and I was one of the very last of the members of that committee to surrender my views. But the testimony of every individual who had given the question special study and investigation, every man charged with the duty of looking into it, was that it would be highly inexpedient to extend American currency into the archipelago now, for the reasons that have been explained to the House by the chairman of the committee in the debate to-day and in the debate when the bill was before the House two or three weeks ago. Following the judgment of these men, I came to the conclusion that it was the solemn duty of the country to establish the gold standard in the archipelago and to make such coins as would accommodate themselves to the demands of the business of the islands and that would be in conformity with the customs and traditions of the people there. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am earnestly in favor of the pending measure.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman why it is he believes in the unit of value. The House bill which the Committee on Insular Affairs reported originally provided that the American gold dollar should be the unit of value. The Senate bill provides for a gold peso, with half the gold that is in the American dollar, which shall be the unit of value. Now, why is it that the Senate and the committee of which the gentleman is a member provides a coin which is to be the unit of value, but does not provide for the coinage of a single one, nor provide that if they are coined they shall be legal tender, but on the contrary excludes from them the legal-tender quality?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman will be kind enough to favor me with an opportunity to answer. The unit of value fixed by the Senate bill is a gold peso. The silver pesos, if they are to be redeemed at all, shall be redeemed in American gold. The House bill, as it was originally reported by the committee, provided that the American gold dollar should be the standard of value in the islands. The Senate bill now under consideration provides that a peso containing 12.9 grains of gold—just half as much as the American gold dollar—shall be the standard unit of value. It provides for no coinage of gold pesos. The standard of value is an abstraction. It is necessary in establishing a currency system in any country that some standard be fixed for the measurement of values.

The gentleman must bear in mind that the money standard of value does not need to be actually coined and pass current. There are three prime functions of money. One is as a measure of value, another a means of exchange, and the other to discharge obligations. We are here creating a new coin that is simply to perform the first function, that of measuring the values; and as it is not to be coined it can not perform the other two functions at all. It is not necessary that it should perform them. The bill defines the relation of the silver peso with the fixed unit of value and fixes the relations between the silver peso and American gold coin. The new silver peso and American gold perform the other two functions of money. The abstract peso is a fiction and can not be part of the currency of the islands, though it is the standard by which the currency is measured.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Then it ought to be coined.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was adopted for the purpose of having as complete a system of money there in the local nomenclature as possible, having a standard unit of value in the peso, and having the local current coin in pesos, so that the silver and gold peso would mean in trade and literature the same thing.

Mr. PARKER. We do not coin gold dollars.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. As the gentleman from New Jersey has truly suggested, we do not coin any gold dollars in this country.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes; we have coined them.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We have no gold dollars in this country.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Ought not we to have at least one of these gold pesos coined?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no; I think not. The law does not require, and common sense does not demand, that the Government shall do so foolish a thing as to organize a mint and prepare equipment to coin one single gold peso as a standard of value, as an object lesson. It is an abstraction pure and simple, and men who understand the science of currency know that it is not essential that there be a single gold peso coined. That is no argument whatever against the validity or wisdom of the provision contained in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I understand the gentleman's position to be this: That the unit of value need only be an abstraction.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is all; all a unit of value need to be is an abstraction. Value itself is an abstraction; it is not a tangible thing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration, aside from its departure from the bill reported by the Insular Committee to the House weeks ago in relation to the standard of value, contains important changes, some of which were suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut, and I think they are improvements over the original measure. Taken as a whole, the bill is as good a one, I think, as is possible under the existing circumstances to agree upon. We all admit the imperative necessity of enacting some legislation along this line for the relief of the situation in the archipelago, and while we repine over definitions and haggle over our favorite theories in relation to coinage, the condition of destitution and distress in the islands continues to grow more aggravated and more direful every day in the week.

It is the solemn duty of the Congress to get together on the best measure it can agree upon, and I believe that I can with propriety express the judgment that the pending bill is perhaps the best expression that can be made at this time, in view of the wide conflict of views on the question. I reassert that I have much sympathy for the gentlemen who entertain different views from those expressed in this measure, but a majority of the men on this side of the House, a majority of the men in the other branch of the Congress, a majority of the members of the Committee on Insular Affairs have reported and recommended this measure, and I think it ought to be accepted. I believe it is a fairly good measure, and in the future, if it is found to be weak in any respect, it can be remedied by subsequent legislation. I believe that members of the House ought to stand together in support of this bill, not that it is perfect, but because it is the best measure that can be gotten under existing conditions, and that it will afford great relief to the people of the archipelago.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I am constitutionally averse to thrashing over old straw, but I can not resist the temptation to call the attention of the House to the curious if not absurd legislative situation which confronts us. We are threatened now, at any rate, with the passage of a bill that has never received the vote of either House. Some time since the Senate passed a bill for the coinage in the Philippine Islands which was substantially a bill for the continuance and stabilization of the silver standard there. After that the Committee on Insular Affairs brought into the House of Representatives this very identical bill upon which we are voting this morning, a piebald, nondescript sort of a bill, with not a single thread of consistency running along in any one principle from the beginning to the end of it. It is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, and could not be justified by any fundamental principle of any sort.

The main reason given by gentlemen who are advocating this bill against the idea of putting American coinage into the Philippine Islands is that doing that would change the coinage system there, requiring the people to become accustomed to an entirely new system, disarrange business, and perhaps disrupt some business. And yet they want to enact a bill introducing a coinage system which will be just as new to these people, which will require just as much trouble to become accustomed to it, and when they are accustomed to it will be unlike any coinage system of any place on earth, especially unlike the coinage system of the people of the United States, whose flag floats over the territory where the system is to be in existence.

Mr. Speaker, the question for the House of Representatives to determine is whether it will be bunkoed, whether it will be bulldozed, whether it will stultify itself, or whether, on the other hand, it will assert that it is really and practically a part of the legislative power of the Federal Government. Some time ago the House had this very bill up, and it went down before the onslaught of the opposition—the nonpartisan opposition—of men appealing to reason alone, on the fundamental idea that Federal functions ought to be exercised uniformly throughout the United States; also upon the ground that, if we had to make a change there, disarranging business and disturbing customs, it would be better to make at once the whole change that we must finally make rather than to make two different changes before arriving at the final stage, and thereby causing two disruptions.

And then what happened? The bill which the House adopted went to another body, not a thousand miles from here, whose very name I am forbidden by parliamentary law to mention. And what happened when it got to that body? Every fundamental principle that had been asserted and saved by the House of Representatives, after a well-reasoned and well-argued fight, was set aside for "a mess of pottage"—by whom or why or how it is not necessary here to state, nor is it necessary to state the nature of the pottage nor the name of him or them to whom it was pretended to be offered. And now we are faced with a bill that neither House indorses; that a majority of neither House believes in; that this House has voted down in so many words, and that the Senate once substantially voted down by taking the bill which the Senate formerly agreed to as a substitute, both in the committee and on the floor of the Senate.

And we are begged now to pass this piebald, nondescript, spotted thing—inconsistent with itself from beginning to end, opposed to the judgment of the House, opposed to the judgment of the Senate, neither the silver standard of the Orient nor the gold standard of the Occident—and we must do this because, forsooth, some financial "expert" has said that it is a "mighty good thing;" that it is a beautiful structure; that it is a rare bird, financially, the like of which was never seen before; that all its proportions are symmetrically and fearfully and wonderfully made. It will be unimitated by anybody else and is unprecedented in the financial world, but with all that is a beautiful structure upon the line of combining in some way or other (possessing at least the interesting characteristic of novelty) a non-legal-tender gold standard with a legal-tender silver circulation at a fixed ratio.

The question is whether the House of Representatives proposes to be substantially and really and genuinely a part of the legislative body of this country or not. That is the question with which we are faced to-day. Are we going to stultify ourselves? Is this side going to do it? Are gentlemen on the other side who voted for the bill which was passed here a month ago and against this bill going to stultify themselves upon the miserable plea that if they do not do this they can not do anything? Why can they not do something? If gentlemen who are contending so strenuously for the introduction of a right monetary system into the Philippine Islands believe that our own monetary system is the right system, then why make two bites at this cherry? Why not do the work at once and be done with it? You can do it if you want to do it. Why enact a law voted down by both Houses? That is all there is in this discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] for the time he has yielded me.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL].

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I am a good deal influenced by the statements of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who represented the opposite side of this question when it was before the House formerly, that the practical result of getting into a controversy with the Senate at this stage of the session would be no legislation, for while I believe that the measure which the House sent to the Senate was a better measure than that the Senate returns to the House, yet I think that the Senate measure will bring a great improvement over existing conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I for one should prefer that the people of the Philippine Islands should decide for themselves what sort of money they want for themselves, even if they should decide in favor of wampum, or beads, or shells. I should rather have them suited with the money that they use than to try to impose upon them some other money that I think they ought to have.

But, unfortunately, we can not at present leave the question for them to decide. They had a legislature at one time, which Mr. John Barrett said would compare favorably with the legislature of Japan. But that legislature we have forcibly broken up. We have dispersed it at the point of the bayonet. We have killed or imprisoned their leaders. And the only legislation that that country can have must come from the Congress of the United States. Under these circumstances, I feel as if it were my duty to contribute whatever of judgment I have for their benefit. I do not think that in dealing with a question of this kind, for a people whom we have put in that condition, I am justified in considering the glory of the Republican party or even of the United States. I feel that in such a case I should look with an eye single to the interests of the people concerned.

Now, I wish to say a word upon a suggestion which was made from an authoritative source in another body—that the bill which passed the House of Representatives some weeks ago did not pass by a "real majority," because the majority was not all made up of one party, but was composed of Democrats and 28 Republicans. Now, I am always ready to seek light and leading and to be reproved for my failings; but I should like to know how it came to pass that that particular bill was a party measure. Had there been any caucus upon it? Had there been any party platform with reference to it? And if it became a party measure by reason of the fact that it was reported by a committee, then, upon that theory, does not every detail of legislation that comes from a committee become a party measure?

Take the subject-matter of this very bill we are dealing with. Last summer the committee of one House of Congress reported a proposition in favor of the silver standard for the Philippine Islands. This very winter that same committee reports a gold standard for the Philippine Islands. If one of these propositions was party policy, the other became also a party measure. There was that change from last summer to this winter; and upon that theory of party government it becomes necessary for the representatives of the people each day to go out and consult the weather vane and possibly to box the compass and get in line with somebody in order to be good party men. Now, Mr. Speaker, if government by party means that party responsibility is to extend to every detail of legislation, then it seems to me that we shall have inevitably that government of groups which is so very much deplored. Great masses of men can only unite upon great principles. They can not unite upon mere unimportant details, and it would be an abuse and a perversion of the idea of party that all sorts of measures that come up here and are reported by committees should be considered party measures.

Now, with reference to this particular bill, it seems to me an important point is whether the gold standard which was established by the bill which the House sent to the Senate, and is in terms established by the bill that the Senate returned here, can be better upheld and maintained by the House bill or by the Senate bill. For my part, I would rather the burdens of maintaining the gold standard should rest upon the shoulders of a powerful people like ourselves than to transmit that burden, as we do by this Senate bill, to the people of the Philippine Islands, to a weak government, which may be entirely unequal to performing the task.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to what I consider the weakest spot in the bill now under consideration, and that is the provision to maintain the parity of the two pesos in the Philippine Islands. This bill provides for the coinage of 75,000,000 silver pesos, which shall be maintained at a parity with a gold unit, whose coinage is not provided for. In order to maintain that parity the bill provides that the Philippine government may issue 20,000,000 pesos of gold certificates for the purpose of buying gold with which to maintain this parity—that is, $10,000,000 worth of gold certificates.

The bill provides that three millions of these ten millions of gold reserve may be used to purchase silver bullion with which to coin the silver pesos, leaving seven millions of gold to maintain the parity of 75,000,000 pesos in the islands. In other words, 1 gold peso in the island must maintain the parity of over 7 silver pesos. That would be a considerable burden for even a country like ours, but it is much worse when you come to impose a burden of that character upon a little, poor, poverty-stricken country like the Philippine Islands, a country without any gold, a country which uses no gold, a country without any commerce by which it can secure gold—every gold dollar that it gets to maintain its parity it must purchase by putting its people in debt. I say it is unreasonable for any man who believes in sound money to stand here and contend that this is a sufficient provision to maintain the parity of gold and silver in the Philippine Islands.

Seventy-five million pesos are to be issued in silver, and the only way to keep them at par—and it must be remembered that there is considerable fiat money in the silver peso in the Philippine Islands—is with seven millions of gold dollars purchased by the people of those islands. Suppose it failed. What is the result? Why, you have their silver pesos at a discount, and you have the same conditions that you have there now. I say that as long as those islands remain a part of the territory of the United States they are entitled to the same kind of money that we have in the United States. We have no more right to impose upon those poor people the burden of maintaining the soundness of their currency than we have to impose that burden upon any other Territory of the United States. My position in this House is well known—that I am opposed to holding those islands. I want to see them made free and independent, but while they are a part of the United States I want to see the United States treat them fairly and honorably. I believe now under our Constitution that the American money is already a legal tender in the Philippine Islands.

I know that we can supply them with that much more quickly than we can supply them with money under this bill, for, as has been said, it would take some time to establish the machinery with which to furnish them this silver money, and when they have it the parity will exist like the gold peso of the gentleman from Indiana—only in fiction and name. Why, they provide in this bill that a party in the Philippine Islands may provide in his contract that the debt shall be paid in so many pesos of gold, and yet no provision whatever is made for the coinage or supply of that kind of money. In what shall such contract be paid? If the contract provides that it shall be paid in so many gold pesos, where is the debtor to get the gold pesos? It makes no difference how much gold may be discovered in the Philippine Islands, there is no provision in this bill that it may be coined into their money in order to help maintain the parity between the two metals. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that in my judgment this is a very fatal objection to this bill. One other objection to it, which was not in the bill originally reported to the House, is this:

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. This bill provides that these certificates of indebtedness issued by the Philippine government to purchase this gold shall not be subject to taxation anywhere in the United States. Mr. Speaker, I insist that if we have the power to exempt those bonds from taxation in our States and in our municipalities, it would not be wise, it would not be just, to put such a provision in this bill. It is entirely different from exempting the bonds of this Government from such taxation. The bonds of the American Government are bonds that must be paid by all of the people of the United States, and it is supposed that when they are exempted from this taxation it enhances their value, and the higher they sell the more benefit will come to the whole people of the country. But this will not increase the value or sale of those bonds in the Philippine Islands, because the American investor will be brought into competition with the investor of Europe—the investor from England, France, and Germany—and they will pay no more. We can not exempt them from taxation in such foreign countries, and by exempting them from taxation in the United States we give the American investor this advantage at a corresponding disadvantage to our own taxpayers.

I say it would not enable them to sell their bonds at any higher price. The law already provides that the interest shall not exceed 4 per cent. It is not likely that they will be issued at a much lower rate than that, and there will be no trouble in selling those bonds at par at that rate of interest. Yet if an American wishes to invest his money in the bonds of those islands, an American living in my town or in yours, and transfer his property that is now taxable into these bonds, drawing 4 per cent interest annually, he can do so and escape all local taxation to that extent. I say, Mr. Speaker, even if we have the power, it is unfair and it is unjust to put such a provision in this bill. No more have we the right to exempt such bonds from municipal, county, and State taxation than we have to exempt the bonds of any other Territory in the United States from such taxation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, this bill provides—and I desire to call the attention of the House to that for one moment and then I am through—that the gold peso shall be the unit of value, and yet it makes no provision anywhere for the coinage of any such peso, or any multiple thereof. I do not know whether that is omitted by mistake or not. I would infer from reading another provision of this bill that the framers of it thought that such coinage was provided for; for when we come to read the section providing for the maintenance of the parity of these metals, it says:

To maintain such parity between the silver Philippine pesos and the gold pesos herein provided for.

So when they were preparing that provision they evidently supposed that they were providing for the coinage of a gold peso. They not only fail to provide for the coinage of the gold peso or any multiple thereof but fail to make it a legal tender, after providing it shall be the standard of value. It seems to me that we should extend our American money to those islands, and that the passage of a bill like this can not very much improve their present condition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has fourteen minutes remaining and the gentleman from Virginia has two minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] would exhaust his time.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is anybody on this side who wants to occupy the two minutes. So the debate can be considered as closed so far as this side is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia surrenders the floor. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, since on the occasion of the consideration of the House bill I voted for the establishment of American money in the Philippines, I deem it my duty to state why I shall support this bill now. All legislation is a compromise. All bills reported by committees are compromises, and no man should be so self-willed and opinionated that he would not concede and yield so long as such concession or such yielding does not involve a principle.

I am convinced that something ought to be done in the Philippine Islands. I am in the position, so to speak, of a physician who, coming to attend a patient who is dangerously ill and not having at hand the thing that he knows is a complete remedy for the trouble, would temporize by giving the patient the best thing at hand. I am convinced that the bill now before this House is the only thing that can become a law at this session of Congress. What will be the result if this bill passes? It will be the immediate establishment of the gold standard there.

I shall not attempt to point out how I would amend this bill. It is sufficient for me that this is the best thing that can be done now, and does not involve the violation of any principle. Therefore it is my duty as a man, my duty as a legislator, to vote for this measure. When I voted to establish American money in the Philippines it was not because I thought the American system of finance and currency was perfect. God knows that. It is in my judgment very far from perfect. I believe that American money there would be better for those islands than the money provided in the House bill, which was practically the same as this measure; but, notwithstanding I believe that, yet recognizing the fact that it can not be planted there, I am bound as a man and a legislator to vote for this measure under the circumstances. [Applause.] Now, what will be the probable course of events? With the gold standard once established we can go on in the future and supplement the law that we pass to-day. Let us hope that at no very distant day it may be better than the system we ourselves have to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, even in two minutes I believe that I can tell the House something of the reason why every thinking man in the Philippines who has studied the conditions there declares that the bill as it passed the House would bring untold disaster on those islands. The effect of that bill would be to deprive them immediately of the only currency that they have. Their money now is the Mexican dollar or peso of 416 grains. Our dollar contains less silver, 412½ grains. Their fractional currency contains like amounts of silver as the peso without taking off any percentage. These are the only coins that they use. The bill as passed by the House declares that this money shall hereafter be receivable only at its bullion value, and be made merchandise at a price that changes and declines from day to day. It demonetizes their only currency, and orders this impoverished people to buy American money or go without.

The committee bill, favored by the Senate and by all close students of this problem, proposes a different plan. It provides for the gradual recoinage of these Mexican dollars or pesos into a limited coinage of Philippine pesos of the same weight and fineness, which shall, like our silver coins, be really redeemable in gold or receivable instead of gold at a fixed ratio. This new silver coinage will be less a fiat money than ours, and have more bullion value, but, like ours, it will be redeemable in gold and to some extent a token or subsidiary coin also. But it will be the same coin in bullion value that they have had and can use. It is the same coin in other silver countries in the Orient, as, for instance, Japan, where precisely the same gold and silver coin is in use with nearly the same relative value. It can be used in silver-using countries as the Mexican peso could be used before.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, our silver coin could not be so used. It is grossly overvalued. It has not the weight of the Mexican peso. It is a little different in alloy and has not the same ring. It will not pass like that dollar in silver-using countries. It contains only 37½ cents' worth of silver, and yet is called a dollar. This Philippine coinage will be much honester than ours. It will contain more than twice the per cent of bullion value. Its real intrinsic value will be 75 per cent of its face value instead of 37 per cent. But after all it will be a subsidiary coinage, limited in amount but redeemable as such, and at the same time it will be the coin that the people are used to taking, undebased, unclipped, and with a fairly close intrinsic value of its own.

But meanwhile there will be no sudden change, no sudden destruction of the whole currency of the island, no sudden lowering of prices by the change of the unit of value, no stoppage of business by the absolute dearth of money, no endeavor to make the peasant accept a 50-cent piece for a 416-grain peso of nearly two and one-fourth times its weight, and to make him sell his 416-grain dollar for 37½ cents of our token currency, or whatever price its bullion value may fall to.

The new Philippine currency will be better and not worse than ours. Its silver coinage, like ours, will be subsidiary; but it will contain nearly its face value in bullion. It will not be, like ours, a mere token. It will not be so likely to be counterfeited. It will be the standard coin of silver countries, and available for export thither. It will be the coin they are used to, and which is needed where credit does not exist, and the wages of a few cents a day must be paid in a money that everyone understands.

It would be cruelty unspeakable to deprive these island possessions of their only tool of trade by wiping out their only circulating medium. Yes, put them on a gold basis—the bill does that; make silver subsidiary—the bill does that; but in doing so the bill likewise has regard to present values and present coinage, refrains from demonetizing the present coin until new pieces are minted to take its place, and makes those new pieces substantially the same except that they bear the stamp of the United States and are receivable at a fixed relation to its gold coinage. It makes the gold dollar the unit of value, for it makes half that dollar the gold peso, and it makes the whole silver coinage subsidiary, but at an honester rate than ours, so that the old Mexican dollar or peso, with more silver than ours, is redeemable at 50 cents, or nearer its real bullion value.

I heartily support the committee as to this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire, in the spirit of all kindness, but yet in the spirit of all fairness, to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. He said that he should not have addressed the House upon this important measure at this time had it not been for an attack I made upon him. I made no attack upon him. There was no imputation of wrongful motives—nothing unkind. I simply called attention to what the gentleman had said during the debate some weeks ago. It was said then that Governor Taft had in effect retracted his former opinion as to the unwisdom of introducing the American monetary system into the Philippine Islands.

In this connection, I to-day read from the RECORD what was said during that debate by the gentleman from Connecticut; and then in reply I simply read the cablegram from Manila, dated February 5, since the bill passed the House, from Governor Taft to the Secretary of War, saying that it would be a great mistake to introduce American money into the islands. There was no attack. If there be an attack in that, it is the facts that make it, not "the gentleman from Wisconsin." I was bound, as a friend of Governor Taft, to call the attention of the House to the wrong construction put upon his letter in the previous debate. In doing this I did only my duty—a duty which I would gladly perform even for the gentleman from Connecticut, if he were absent and I believed an interpretation which was not fair had been put on anything he had said, written, or done.

I furthermore called attention to another error of fact made by the gentleman from Connecticut in the previous debate, not by way of attack, not by way of wrongful imputation of motives, but simply as a statement of facts. During that debate the gentleman made this very important and effective statement: "There is in this city to-day a gentleman from Mexico who wants the American ratio established in Mexico, so as to make their money conform exactly with that of the United States." To-day I called the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman who was here representing the Mexican Government did not ask to have the money of his country conform exactly to that of the United States, but that, on the contrary, his memorandum to the State Department indicated that his Government was looking with favor to the very plan embodied in the bill here pending, and which was also contained in the original bill reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs. That was my only attack on the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi, an able debater, a little while ago used this language:

We propose to establish here for the Philippine Islands a system unlike any other system which ever existed in the financial world.

A complete reply to this is contained in the testimony of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman know of any system on earth fixing gold as the standard of value that does not make that gold legal tender and that does not make anything but silver a legal tender?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The bill makes United States gold a legal tender.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But not the gold peso, for the coinage of which your bill provides, nor any multiple of that coin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Gold coin is receivable in unlimited quantity; but the gold peso as provided for in this bill will not be coined—so diminutive a coin will not be made. I wish to answer specifically what the gentleman has said, and as I have only a minute I can not yield to the gentleman to ask me another question. The gentleman said the system we propose is unlike any other coinage system on earth. Here is what the Director of the Mint, speaking of this system, says:

It is exactly the system of India.

That is the Director of the Mint; that is the testimony of Mr. Hollander; that is the statement of Governor Wright; that is the testimony of Mr. Peabody; that is the testimony of Mr. Conant; that is the testimony of Professor Jenks, and of all other experts who have been before our committee.

The gentleman from Mississippi says, by way of criticism, that they will have no gold there. Now, the Director of the Mint declares that they have practically no gold in circulation in India. Secretary Moody, then a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs, questioned him thus: "Apparently, judging from that report—and that is the report of the Indian commission on this subject—the conversion has been extremely successful in India." Mr. Roberts answered, "Entirely so." Mr. Moody asked, "How would the magnitude of the task in the Philippines compare with that in India?" Mr. Roberts said, "It is a much greater task in India. The stock of rupees there is in the neighborhood of five hundred millions, and in the Philippines only about twenty millions, reckoning in our money." Mr. Moody said, "Certainly there can be no comparison to the disadvantage of the Philippines * * * owing the repugnance to any change which had to be overcome?" Mr. Roberts replied, "I see no obstacle in the Philippines that would not apply with even greater force in India."

So, instead of the proposed system being unprecedented, it is exactly the system used in India, where it was easily and successfully established. During the previous debate these facts were called to the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi, and yet, to-day he has iterated and reiterated them. Aaron Burr said, "Keep repeating a thing not true and most people will begin to believe it." Now, what the gentleman from Mississippi has said to-day is not any more true than it was the first time it was uttered. This is not an unprecedented system. In Note F to the report of the Secretary of War, 1900, the then Secretary of the Treasury, Lyman J. Gage, said: "This is analogous to the system now in vogue in the United States." It is also analogous to the system in vogue in France, where they have a limited coinage of silver receivable for public dues and for private debts, but not redeemable in gold except at the option of the Government.

This bill proposes a silver peso of limited coinage at the ratio of 2 to 1 of gold, to be received for all debts, public and private, for tariff duty, taxes, etc., but not under the law absolutely to be redeemed in gold.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi rose.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one minute to answer a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The question I want to ask the gentleman is this: Does this bill anywhere provide that the gold peso, which is to be the standard of value in the Philippine Islands under this bill, or that any multiple of that peso, is a legal tender anywhere in the Philippine Islands? Does the gentleman know of any other system with that incongruity?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This bill says that the gold peso, consisting of 12.9 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, shall be the unit of value.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Can not the gentleman answer my question categorically? It is capable of that form of answer.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am answering it. As a matter of fact, it is not at all necessary that that exceedingly diminutive coin——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask if that or any multiple of the peso is a legal tender?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; in this way.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask that the gentleman have one minute more to answer that question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks that the gentleman from Wisconsin have one minute more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A silver peso is to pass current at the rate of one to one with a gold peso at two to one with the gold dollar. It is expressly so provided in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I know the gentleman is seeking the same end that I am, the truth for the enlightenment of the members of the House. Is it not true in this very bill the bill goes on to say what shall be a legal tender, and omits from the list of tender the gold peso or any multiple of it?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Nobody pretends that a diminutive coin, the size of our 3-cent piece, is going to be coined into gold and pass current among these people.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. True, but no gold multiple of it, however large, is made a legal tender.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to return to the House of Representatives the enrolled bill (S. 5718) providing for the sale of sites for manufacturing or individual plants in the Indian Territory, with the request that the House of Representatives vacate the action of the Speaker in signing the said enrolled bill, and return the same, and the message of the Senate agreeing to the amendment of the House to said bill, to the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had presented this day to the President of the United States for his approval bill of the following title:

H. R. 16021. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

INCREASE OF PENSION FOR LOST LIMBS IN THE MILITARY AND NAVAL SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the bill S. 4850, an act to increase the pension of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States, or are totally disabled in the same, for the purpose of having it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill S. 4850, "An act to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States, or are totally disabled in the same," numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, and 8, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 8.

That the House recede from its amendment to the title of the bill and agree to an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert: "An act to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States;" and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

This bill (S. 4850) passed the Senate April 19, 1902, granting an increase of pension of $15 per month to those who lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States.

It was amended by the House on June 16, 1902, by cutting down the proposed increase from $15 to $10 per month, by granting its benefits to those only whose disabilities were incurred prior to August 4, 1886, and by increasing the pension of those who have lost both feet to $100 per month, and by adding a new section (section 2) of the bill, increasing from $12 to $30 per month the pension of those drawing the maximum rating under the act of June 27, 1890, provided they served one year and were so disabled as to require the frequent and periodical aid and attendance of another person.

As a result of the conference the Senate has agreed to the rates of increase allowed by the House, viz, $10 per month, instead of $15 per month, as the bill originally passed the Senate, and your conferees have receded from the amendment so that the increased rates apply to all pensioners who lost limbs in the service without limitation as to date of incurrence of the disability, and they have also receded from the amendment contained in section 2, increasing the pensions of those totally disabled so as to require the aid and attendance of another person, who are drawing the maximum under the act of June 27, 1890, viz, $12 per month.

PHILIPPINE COINAGE.

The SPEAKER. Recurring to the special order, the first question is on agreeing to the first amendment.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.
